(articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution)

Third item on the agenda:
Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations

Report III (Part 1A)

General Report and observations concerning particular countries

ISBN 978-92-2-120634-7
ISSN 0074-6681

First edition 2009

The publication of information concerning action taken in respect of international labour Conventions and Recommendations does not imply any expression of view by the International Labour Office on the legal status of the State having communicated such information (including the communication of a ratification or declaration), or on its authority over the areas or territories in respect of which such information is communicated; in certain cases this may present problems on which the ILO is not competent to express an opinion.

ILO publications can be obtained through major booksellers or ILO local offices in many countries, or direct from ILO Publications, International Labour Office, CH-1211 Geneva 22, Switzerland. A catalogue or list of new publications will be sent free of charge from the above address.

The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations is an independent body composed of legal experts charged with examining the application of ILO Conventions and Recommendations by ILO member States. The annual report of the Committee of Experts covers numerous matters related to the application of ILO standards. The structure of the report, as modified in 2003, is divided into the following parts:

- (a) The Reader's note provides indications on the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference (their mandate, functioning and the institutional context in which they operate) (Part 1A, pages 1–4).
- (b) Part I: the General Report describes the manner in which the Committee of Experts undertakes its work and the extent to which member States have fulfilled their constitutional obligations in relation to international labour standards, and it draws the attention to issues of general interest arising out of the Committee's work (Part 1A, pages 5–41).
- (c) Part II: Observations concerning particular countries cover the sending of reports, the application of ratified Conventions (see section I), and the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities (see section II) (Part 1A, pages 43–703).
- (d) Part III: General Survey, in which the Committee of Experts examines the state of the legislation and practice regarding a specific area covered by a given number of Conventions and Recommendations. This examination covers all member States regardless of whether or not they have ratified the given Conventions. The General Survey is published as a separate volume (Report III (Part 1B)) and this year it examines the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), the Protocol of 2002 to the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981, and the Occupational Safety and Health Recommendation, 1981 (No. 164) (Part 1B).

Finally, the Information document on ratifications and standards-related activities is prepared by the Office and supplements the information contained in the report of the Committee of Experts. This document primarily provides an overview of recent developments relating to international labour standards, the implementation of special supervisory procedures and technical cooperation in relation to international labour standards. It contains, in tabular form, information on the ratification of Conventions and Protocols, and "country profiles" (Part 2).

Reader's note

Overview of the ILO supervisory mechanisms

Since its creation in 1919, the mandate of the International Labour Organization (ILO) has included adopting international labour standards and promoting their ratification and application in its member States and supervision of this application as a fundamental means of achieving its objectives. In order to monitor the progress of its member States in the application of international labour standards, the ILO has developed supervisory mechanisms which are unique at the international level.¹

Under article 19 of the ILO Constitution, a number of obligations arise for member States upon the adoption of international labour standards, including the requirement to submit newly adopted standards to national competent authorities and the obligation to report at intervals on measures taken to give effect to the provisions of unratified Conventions and Recommendations.

A number of supervisory mechanisms exist whereby the Organization examines the standards-related obligations of member States deriving from ratified Conventions. This supervision occurs both in the context of a regular procedure through annual reports (article 22 of the ILO Constitution),² as well as through special procedures based on complaints or representations to the Governing Body made by ILO constituents (articles 24 and 26 of the Constitution). Moreover, since 1950, a special procedure has existed whereby complaints relating to freedom of association are referred to the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body. The Committee on Freedom of Association may also examine complaints relating to member States that have not ratified the relevant freedom of association Conventions.

Role of employers' and workers' organizations

As a natural consequence of its tripartite structure, the ILO was the first international organization to associate the social partners directly in its activities. The participation of employers' and workers' organizations in the supervisory mechanism is recognized in the Constitution under article 23, paragraph 2, which provides that reports submitted by governments in accordance with articles 19 and 22 must be communicated to the representative organizations.

In practice, representative employers' and workers' organizations may submit to their governments' comments on the reports concerning the implementation by the latter of ratified Conventions. They may, for instance, draw attention to a discrepancy in law or practice regarding a Convention and thus lead the Committee of Experts to request further information from the government. Furthermore, any employers' or workers' organization may submit comments on the application of Conventions directly to the Office. The Office will then forward these comments to the government concerned, which will have an opportunity to respond before the comments are examined by the Committee of Experts.

² Reports are submitted every two years for so-called fundamental and priority Conventions, and every five years for others. Since 2003, reports have been due for groups of Conventions according to subject matter.

Origins of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

During the early years of the ILO, both the adoption of international labour standards and the regular supervisory work were undertaken within the framework of the plenary sitting of the annual International Labour Conference. However, the considerable increase in the number of ratifications of Conventions rapidly led to a similarly significant increase in the number of annual reports submitted. It soon became clear that the plenary of the Conference would not be able to examine all these reports at the same time as adopting standards and discussing other important matters. In response, the Conference in 1926 adopted a resolution³ establishing on an annual basis a Conference Committee (subsequently named the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards) and requesting the Governing Body to appoint a technical committee (subsequently named the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations) which would be responsible for drawing up a report for the Conference. These two committees have become the two pillars of the ILO supervisory system.

Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations Composition

The Committee of Experts is composed of 20 members,⁴ who are outstanding legal experts at the national and international levels. The members of the Committee are appointed by the Governing Body upon the proposal of the Director-General. Appointments are made in a personal capacity from among completely impartial persons of competence and independent standing drawn from all regions of the world, in order to enable the Committee to have at its disposal first-hand experience of different legal, economic and social systems. The appointments are made for renewable periods of three years. In 2002, the Committee decided that there would be a limit of 15 years' service for all members, representing a maximum of four renewals after the first three-year appointment. At its 79th Session (November–December 2008), the Committee decided that its Chairperson would be elected for a period of three years which would be once renewable for a further three years. At the start of each session, the Committee would also elect a Reporter.

Mandate

The Committee of Experts meets annually in November–December. In accordance with the mandate given by the Governing Body,⁵ the Committee is called upon to examine the following:

- the annual reports under article 22 of the Constitution on the measures taken by member States to give effect to the provisions of the Conventions to which they are parties;
- the information and reports concerning Conventions and Recommendations communicated by member States in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution;
- information and reports on the measures taken by member States in accordance with article 35 of the Constitution.⁶

The task of the Committee of Experts is to indicate the extent to which each member State's legislation and practice are in conformity with ratified Conventions and the extent to which member States have fulfilled their obligations under the ILO Constitution in relation to standards. In carrying out this task, the Committee adheres to its principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality.⁷

The comments of the Committee of Experts on the fulfilment by member States of their standards-related obligations take the form of either observations or direct requests. Observations contain comments on fundamental questions raised by the application of a particular Convention by a member State. These observations are reproduced in the annual report of the Committee of Experts, which is then submitted to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June every year. Direct requests usually relate to questions of a more technical nature or of lesser importance, or contain requests for information. They are not published in the report of the Committee of Experts, but are communicated directly to the government concerned.⁸ In addition, the Committee of Experts examines, in the context of the General Survey, the state of the legislation and practice concerning a specific area covered by a given number of Conventions and Recommendations chosen by the Governing Body. This General Survey is based on the reports submitted in accordance with articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution, and it covers all member States regardless of whether or not they have ratified the concerned Conventions. This year's General Survey covers occupational safety and health.

⁵ Terms of reference of the Committee of Experts, Minutes of the 103rd Session of the Governing Body (1947), Appendix XII, para. 37.

⁶ Article 35 covers the application of Conventions to non-metropolitan territories.

⁷ In its 1987 report, the Committee stated that in its evaluation of national law and practice in relation to the requirements of international labour Conventions: "... its function is to determine whether the requirements of a given Convention are being met, whatever the economic and social conditions existing in a given country. Subject only to any derogations, which are expressly permitted by the Convention itself, these requirements remain constant and uniform for all countries. In carrying out this work, the Committee is guided by the standards laid down in the Convention alone, mindful, however, of the fact that the modes of their implementation may be different in different States".

Report of the Committee of Experts

As a result of its work, the Committee produces an annual report. The structure of the report is divided into the following parts:

- Part I: the General Report describes, on the one hand, the progress of the work of the Committee of Experts and specific matters relating to it that have been addressed by the Committee and, on the other hand, the extent to which member States have fulfilled their constitutional obligations in relation to international labour standards (Report III (Part 1A)).
- Part II: Observations concerning particular countries on the fulfilment of obligations in respect of the submission of reports, the application of ratified Conventions grouped by subject matter and the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities (Report III (Part 1A)).
- Part III: the General Survey is published as a separate volume (Report III (Part 1B)).

Furthermore, an Information document on ratifications and standards-related activities (Report III (Part 2)) accompanies the report of the Committee of Experts.⁹

Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference

Composition

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards is one of the two standing committees of the Conference. It is tripartite and therefore comprises representatives of governments, employers and workers. At each session, the Committee elects its Officers, which include a Chairperson (Government member), two Vice-Chairpersons (Employer member and Worker member) and a Reporter (Government member).

Mandate

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards meets annually at the June session of the Conference. Pursuant to article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Committee shall consider:

- measures taken to give effect to ratified Conventions (article 22 of the Constitution);
- reports communicated in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution (General Surveys);
- measures taken in accordance with article 35 of the Constitution (non-metropolitan territories).

The Committee is required to present a report to the Conference.

Following the independent technical examination carried out by the Committee of Experts, the proceedings of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards provide an opportunity for the representatives of governments, employers and workers to review together the manner in which States are fulfilling their standards-related obligations, particularly with regard to ratified Conventions. Governments are able to elaborate on information previously supplied to the Committee of Experts, indicate any further measures taken or proposed since the last session of the Committee of Experts, draw attention to difficulties encountered in the fulfilment of obligations and seek guidance as to how to overcome such difficulties.

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards discusses the General Report and the General Survey of the Committee of Experts, and the documents submitted by governments. The work of the Conference Committee starts with a general discussion on the standards system, as well as a discussion on the General Survey. The Conference Committee subsequently examines cases of serious failure to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations. Finally, the Conference Committee embarks upon its main task, which is to examine a number of individual cases concerning the application of ratified Conventions which have been the subject of observations by the Committee of Experts. The Conference Committee invites the Government representatives concerned to attend one of its sessions to discuss the observations in question. After listening to these Government representatives, the members of the Conference

⁸ Observations and direct requests are accessible through the ILOLEX database which is available on CD-ROM and via the ILO web site (www.ilo.org/normes).

Committee may ask questions or make comments. At the end of the discussion, the Conference Committee adopts conclusions on the case in question. Furthermore, in accordance with a resolution adopted by the Conference in 2000,¹⁰ the Conference Committee holds, at each of its sessions, a special sitting on the application by Myanmar of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

In its report submitted to the plenary sitting of the Conference for adoption, the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards may invite the member State whose case has been discussed to accept a technical assistance mission by the International Labour Office to increase its capacity to fulfil its obligations, or may propose other types of missions. The Conference Committee may also request a government to submit additional information or address specific concerns in its next report to the Committee of Experts. The Conference Committee also draws the attention of the Conference to certain cases, such as cases of progress and cases of serious failure to comply with ratified Conventions.

Relations between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

In numerous reports, the Committee of Experts has emphasized the importance of the spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility that has always existed in relations between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee. In recent years, it has become the practice for the Chairperson of the Committee of Experts to attend the general discussion of the Conference Committee and the discussion on the General Survey as an observer, with the opportunity to address the Conference Committee at the opening of the general discussion and to make remarks at the end of the discussion on the General Survey. Similarly, the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons of the Conference Committee are invited to meet the Committee of Experts during its sessions and discuss issues of common interest within the framework of a special session for that purpose.

Part I. General Report

1. Introduction

1. The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, appointed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to examine the information and reports submitted under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution by member States of the International Labour Organization on the action taken with regard to Conventions and Recommendations, held its 79th Session in Geneva from 27 November to 12 December 2008. The Committee has the honour to present its report to the Governing Body.

Composition of the Committee

2. The composition of the Committee is as follows: Mr Mario ACKERMAN (Argentina), Mr Anwar Ahmad Rashed AL FUZAIE (Kuwait), Mr Denys BARROW, SC (Belize), Ms Janice R. BELLACE (United States), Mr Lélío BENTES CORRÊA (Brazil), Mr Halton CHEADLE (South Africa), Ms Laura COX, QC (United Kingdom), Ms Blanca Ruth ESPONDA ESPINOSA (Mexico), Mr Abdul G. KOROMA (Sierra Leone), Ms Robyn A. LAYTON, QC (Australia), Mr Pierre LYON-CAEN (France), Ms Angelika NUSSBERGER, MA (Germany), Ms Ruma PAL (India), Mr Raymond RANJEVA (Madagascar), Mr Miguel RODRIGUEZ PIÑERO Y BRAVO FERRER (Spain), Mr Yozo YOKOTA (Japan). The appendix of the General Report contains brief biographies of all the Committee members.

3. The Committee noted with regret that Ms Esponda Espinosa was unable to participate in its work this year.

4. Ms Robyn Layton, QC, informed the Committee that she would not seek a renewal of her mandate which was due to expire at the end of the year. The Committee would like to express its deep appreciation for the outstanding manner in which she carried out her duties during her 15 years of service on the Committee and, in particular, commends her warmly for the excellent and inspired way in which she carried out the important and exacting task of leading the Committee during the five years she served as Chairperson of the Committee.

5. During its session, the Committee welcomed Mr Raymond Ranjeva, nominated by the Governing Body at its 302nd Session (June 2008).

6. The Committee was deeply saddened to learn of the deaths of three of its former members. Mr Semion Aleksandrovich Ivanov (Russian Federation, member of the Committee from 1981 to 1993) devoted most of his professional life to the Institute of State and Law of the Academy of Sciences of the Russian Federation and, through his deep knowledge of Russian and international labour law, became the First President of the Russian Society of Labour Law and Social Security. Mr Antti Suviranta (Finland, member of the Committee from 1984 to 1993), was both professor of labour law and a high-level magistrate, exercising important functions as President of the Supreme Court of Finland. Mr Toshio Yamaguchi (Japan, member of the Committee from 1991 to 2002), was professor of law and a specialist in industrial relations, with a wealth of knowledge of comparative law. The Committee wishes to express its profound recognition of the outstanding contribution to its work demonstrated by these three former members as well as their devotion and competence in the service of social justice and international labour standards at both the national and international levels.

7. In accordance with the decision taken by the Committee at its 78th Session (November–December 2007), the mandate of Ms Bellace as Chairperson of the Committee took effect at the beginning of its present session. The Committee re-elected Mr Al-Fuzaie as Reporter.

Working methods

8. The Committee has in recent years undertaken a thorough examination of its working methods. In order to guide this reflection on working methods efficiently, a subcommittee was set up in 2001. The mandate of the subcommittee includes examining the working methods of the Committee and any related subjects, in order to make appropriate recommendations to the Committee.¹ The subcommittee met on three occasions between 2002 to 2004. During its sessions in 2005 and 2006, issues relating to its working methods were discussed by the Committee in plenary sitting. The subcommittee met once again in 2007.

9. This year the subcommittee met under Mr Yokota, the Chairperson, who was re-elected to that function by the Committee. Following consideration of the recommendations made by the subcommittee, the Committee agreed on the following:

- (1) The question of the measures to be taken to help governments follow-up on the comments of the Committee of Experts was examined once again with a view to supplementing the measures adopted in recent years. The Committee therefore gave instructions to the secretariat that, as appropriate and taking into account the length and substance of the comments, an indication should henceforth be given of the urgency of the issues raised by the Committee so that governments could better prioritize the action to be taken on all of the comments that they receive concerning the application of ratified Conventions.
- (2) The Committee, during its 78th Session (November–December 2007), decided to develop a process of identifying and highlighting examples of “good practices” in countries which come to its attention in the course of reviewing and assessing compliance by member States with Conventions. This process is seen as being beneficial to member States as “good practices” could serve as inspiration for governments and/or as models for the emulation of similar practices. This year, the Committee gave specific consideration to the criteria that it will apply to identify “good practices”. These criteria are set out at paragraph 58 of the Committee’s General Report.
- (3) The Committee was informed by the secretariat of the discussions held at the 303rd Session (November 2008) of the Governing Body on the implications of the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 97th Session (May–June 2008). In particular, explanations were provided on its possible implications for the General Survey and the new format of the questionnaire under article 19 of the Constitution, adopted on an experimental basis for the next General Survey on employment, as well as the possible implications of the 2008 Declaration for the reports requested under article 22 of the Constitution. The Committee set up a working group, composed of five of its members, to assist the Office in the preparation of the next article 19 questionnaire that would be submitted to the Governing Body at its 304th Session (March 2009). On the basis of the discussions held by this working group during the session of the Committee of Experts, the Committee provided guidance to the Office for the preparation of the aforementioned article 19 questionnaire. The Committee will continue to contribute to the revision of the article 22 report forms and will, as appropriate, provide guidance on the preparation of future article 19 questionnaires through the members who have initial responsibility for the respective Conventions.
- (4) With respect to the other matters raised by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session (May–June 2008) of the International Labour Conference, the Committee agreed: (1) new arrangements to enhance the visibility of cases that the Committee decides warrant the insertion of special notes (see paragraphs 45, 46 and 47 of the General Report); (2) to shorten the section of its General Report dealing with collaboration with other international organizations and functions relating to other international instruments to focus on its own interaction with other international bodies (section IV of the present General Report); and (3) to invite the Office to expand the country profiles set out in the information document on ratifications and standards-related activities.

Relations with the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

10. A spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility has consistently prevailed in the Committee’s relations with the International Labour Conference and its Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee of Experts takes the proceedings of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards into full consideration, not only in respect of general matters concerning standard-setting activities and supervisory procedures, but also in particular of specific matters concerning the way in which States fulfil their standards-related obligations. In this context, the Committee again welcomed the participation of Ms Layton, QC, as an observer in the general discussion of the Committee on the Application of Standards of the 97th Session (May–June 2008) of the International Labour Conference. It noted the request by the Conference Committee for the Director-General to renew this invitation for the 98th Session (June 2009) of the Conference. The Committee of Experts accepted this invitation.

11. The Chairperson of the Committee of Experts once again invited the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons of the Committee on the Application of Standards of the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (Mr Edward Potter and Mr Luc Cortebeek, respectively) to participate in a special sitting of the Committee at its present session. Both accepted this invitation and discussed matters of mutual interest with the Committee.

12. The special sitting addressed two issues: matters of common interest; and the implications of the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization (the 2008 Declaration) for the work of both Committees with regard to General Surveys. On the first issue, information was exchanged on the examinations by both Committees of their respective working methods, and particularly the identification by the Committee of Experts of cases in which governments are required to provide full particulars to the Conference (the so-called “double footnotes”) and the selection by the Conference Committee of individual cases relating to the application of ratified Conventions. Second, an exchange of views took place on the recent decisions taken by the Governing Body concerning General Surveys within the framework of the follow-up to the 2008 Declaration. It was emphasized that the current authoritative value of the General Surveys should be preserved. At the same time, it was recognized that the new approach could open many possibilities to increase the impact of the standards system, in particular by providing a holistic view of national situations and a clearer understanding of gaps in law and practice concerning the implementation of international labour standards as well as gaps in standard-setting action. In this context, and in order to optimize the work of both Committees in relation to future General Surveys, it was also acknowledged that certain aspects of their respective organization of work would have to be reviewed.

II. Compliance with obligations

Follow-up to cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations mentioned in the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards

13. The Committee recalls that, at the instigation of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 93rd Session (June 2005) of the International Labour Conference, the two committees, with the assistance of the Office, strengthened the follow-up given to cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations with a view, in so far as possible, to identifying more accurately the difficulties underlying these failures and enabling appropriate solutions to be identified. As both committees have recalled on numerous occasions, such failures hinder the functioning of the supervisory system, which is based primarily on the information provided by governments in their reports. Cases of failure to fulfil reporting obligations therefore have to be given the same level of attention as those relating to the application of ratified Conventions.

14. The Committee notes the discussions held in the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session (May–June 2008) of the International Labour Conference, with particular reference to the general discussion and the discussions and conclusions of the special sitting on cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil their reporting and other standards-related obligations. It notes in particular that the members of the Conference Committee as a whole recalled that both the sending of the majority of reports late and the decrease in the total number of reports received jeopardize the functioning and credibility of the supervisory system.

15. The Committee was informed that, to follow up on the discussions of the Conference Committee, the Office sent targeted letters to the 55 member States mentioned in the relevant paragraphs of the report of the Conference Committee concerning their failure to fulfil the respective obligations (there were 45 such member States in 2007, 49 in 2006 and 53 in 2005). Although 32 of these 55 member States had already been mentioned for the same failures in the 2007 report of the Conference Committee (and even, in some cases, in the 2005 and 2006 reports), it is nevertheless the case that some of them have made significant progress in resolving most of the shortcomings for which they were mentioned. The technical assistance activities undertaken in the context of this individualized follow-up were continued through a close coordination between all the Office units concerned. The standards specialists in subregional offices, who play a crucial role in this respect, have continued to provide assistance and advice to each of the countries concerned. In addition, practical steps were taken this year to ensure an individualized follow-up, both before the session of the Conference, based on the report of the Committee of Experts, and after its session, on the basis of the report of the Conference Committee. Measures have also been taken on a systematic basis, where appropriate, to include issues relating to the sending of reports into the ILO's broader technical cooperation programmes. The work of the two Committees have accordingly contributed to determining the priorities of the technical assistance provided. The external offices were accordingly invited to contact on a priority basis the 32 member States confronted with persistent difficulties: 20 of them have received Office technical assistance since the Conference, or will do so very shortly.

16. The information available this year (discussions of the Committee on the Application of Standards, information from external offices) confirms the Committee's observation in its last report that the difficulties most commonly experienced by member States in fulfilling their obligations are of an institutional nature. These difficulties are caused both by the lack of resources of the authority principally responsible for sending reports (inadequate staff numbers or staff with little knowledge of reporting procedures, frequent staff movements requiring renewed assistance from the Office) and inadequate coordination between this authority and the other authorities required to contribute to the reports, or a lack of clarity in the allocation of responsibilities. Other difficulties were reported by governments, including a lack of translations of documents relating to international labour standards in their national language or the small size of certain units responsible for reporting, and therefore their limited financial and human resources. This latter difficulty affects, amongst others, the authorities of non-metropolitan territories, whose difficulties were specifically noted by the Committee in its previous report. In isolated cases, even authorities with more significant resources may indicate that they are unable to cope with both the sending of reports and other significant tasks. Finally, less frequently, the difficulties can be explained by more deep-rooted reasons relating to national circumstances which prevent the provision of any information on the application of international labour standards and the implementation of technical assistance activities.

17. The Committee notes that, certain of the 55 member States referred to above have, frequently with the assistance of the Office, fulfilled their reporting and other standards-related obligations, in full or in part, since the end of the session of the Conference. In this respect, as it has done systematically for the past three years, the Committee wishes firstly to welcome the action taken by the member States to make up the accumulated backlog in the sending of reports by submitting all the reports due.² It also welcomes the fact that other member States have made use of the period between the Conference and the present session of the Committee of Experts to make up in part for their failings.³ Furthermore, the Committee has been informed that, in view of the efforts made to raise awareness of the importance of the sending of reports by the two Committees, and supplemented by the Office's follow-up, almost all the member States concerned have taken initiatives to overcome their difficulties and that it is rare to find that no action has been taken on the matter. The Committee wishes to note in particular the support provided by certain governments to non-metropolitan territories for the preparation of reports, following the appeal made by the two Committees. Such action to raise the awareness of member States is important as it appears to generate among the governments concerned the necessary will to overcome the difficulties, which is indispensable if technical assistance activities are to be undertaken successfully. It could be at the origin of the rise in the total number of reports received this year.⁴

18. The Committee reminds governments that they are required to comply with all the reporting and other standards-related obligations that they accept upon becoming Members of the Organization. Compliance with these obligations is essential for dialogue between the supervisory bodies and member States on the effective implementation of ratified Conventions. Governments that request technical assistance may benefit from it, yet such assistance can only be useful and adapted to national circumstances if governments are prepared to inform the Office of their specific problems and have the will to adopt lasting solutions. The Committee hopes that the Office will maintain the sustained technical assistance that it has been providing to member States for four years, and without which the difficulties encountered could not be overcome in the long term. Finally, the Committee welcomes the good collaboration that it maintains with the Committee on the Application of Standards on this matter of mutual interest which is essential to the proper discharge of their respective tasks.

A. Reports on ratified Conventions (articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution)

19. The Committee's principal task consists of the examination of the reports supplied by governments on Conventions that have been ratified by member States and that have been declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories.

20. In accordance with the procedure adopted by the Governing Body in November 2001 and March 2002,⁵ particularly with a view to facilitating the collection of information on related subjects at the national level, requests for reports on Conventions covering the same subject are grouped together and addressed simultaneously to each country.⁶ In addition, in the case of the 12 fundamental and priority Conventions, as well as for certain other groups of Conventions containing a large number of instruments, reports are requested, with a view to balancing their submission, in accordance with the English alphabetical order, the first year by member States beginning with the letters A to J, and the second year

² Iraq, Tajikistan and Uzbekistan.

by those whose names begin with the letters K to Z, or the converse⁷ (for a list of Conventions grouped by subject see page v).

21. The Committee also had before it reports especially requested from certain governments on other Conventions for one of the following reasons:

- (a) a first detailed report was due after ratification;
- (b) important discrepancies had previously been noted between national law or practice and the Conventions in question;
- (c) reports due for the previous period had not been received or did not contain the information requested;
- (d) reports were expressly requested by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards.

The Committee also had before it a number of reports that it was unable to examine at its previous session.

22. In some cases, reports are not accompanied by copies of the relevant legislation, statistical data or other documentation necessary for their full examination. In cases where this material was not otherwise available, the Office, as requested by the Committee, has written to the governments concerned asking them to supply the necessary texts to enable the Committee to fulfil its tasks.

23. Appendix I of this report lists the reports received and not received, classified by country/territory and by Convention. Appendix II shows, for each year in which the Conference has met since 1932, the number and percentage of reports received by the prescribed date, by the date of the meeting of the Committee of Experts and by the date of the session of the International Labour Conference.

Reports requested and received

24. A total of 2,517 reports were requested from governments on the application of Conventions ratified by member States (article 22 of the Constitution). At the end of the present session of the Committee, 1,768 of these reports had been received by the Office. This figure corresponds to 70.24 per cent of the reports requested, representing a clear increase in relation to the previous year, when the figure was 65.04 per cent and the total number of reports requested was lower than this year.

25. In addition, 351 reports were requested on Conventions declared applicable with or without modifications to non-metropolitan territories (article 35 of the Constitution). Of these, 217 reports, representing 61.82 per cent, had been received by the end of the Committee's session, representing an important increase in relation to last year, when the figure was 35.86 per cent.

26. The Committee firmly hopes that this increase in the number of reports received, which also includes reports received under article 19 of the Constitution on the occupational safety and health instruments covered by the General Survey,⁸ is the beginning of a lasting positive trend. It requests governments and the Office to continue their respective efforts in this respect. The Committee will continue to follow the issue closely and will specifically draw the attention of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards to it, where necessary.

Compliance with reporting obligations

27. Most of the governments from which reports were due on the application of ratified Conventions have supplied most or all of the reports requested (see Appendix I). However, no reports due have been received for the past two or more years from the following 11 countries: Cape Verde, Denmark (Faeroe Islands), Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Sierra Leone, Somalia, United Republic of Tanzania (Zanzibar), Togo, Turkmenistan, United Kingdom (Anguilla), United Kingdom (British Virgin Islands) and United Kingdom (Falkland Islands (Malvinas)). In addition, all or the majority of the reports due this year have not been received from the following 40 countries: Armenia, Barbados, Belize, Bolivia, Botswana, Burundi, Chad, Comoros, Côte d'Ivoire, Czech Republic, Denmark (Greenland), Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, France (French Southern and Antarctic Territories), Gambia, Guyana, Hungary, Islamic Republic of Iran, Ireland, Liberia, Malta, Namibia, Netherlands (Aruba), Nicaragua, Nigeria, Norway, Panama, Rwanda, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Solomon Islands, Tajikistan, United Republic of Tanzania, United Republic of Tanzania (Tanganyika), Thailand, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Uganda, United Kingdom (Isle of Man), United Kingdom (St Helena) and Vanuatu.

28. The Committee urges the governments of these countries to make every effort to supply the reports requested on ratified Conventions. As it emphasized in paragraph 16 above, the Committee is aware that where no reports have been sent for some time, it is likely that administrative or other problems are preventing the government concerned from fulfilling its obligations under the ILO Constitution. In this respect, the Committee is bound to recall the importance of the assistance provided by the Office, in particular through the specialists on international labour standards in the subregional offices, in helping the governments concerned to overcome these difficulties.

⁸ See paragraph 98 of the General Report.

Late reports

29. The reports due on ratified Conventions should be sent to the Office between 1 June and 1 September of each year. Due consideration is given, when setting this date, to the time required to translate the reports, where necessary, to conduct research into legislation and other documents necessary for the examination of reports and legislation.

30. The Committee observes that by 1 September 2008, the proportion of reports received was 32.4 per cent, compared with 34.2 per cent at its previous session, this latter percentage, as the Committee emphasized, represented a clear increase, as this proportion had remained below 30 per cent of the total reports due for many years. Nevertheless, the number of reports received in time is still fairly low, even though efforts are made by a given number of member States to submit them in time. The Committee is therefore bound to recall that the supervisory system can function adequately only if reports are communicated in due time. This is particularly true in the case of first reports or reports on Conventions where there are serious or continuing discrepancies, which the Committee has to examine in greater depth. The Committee firmly hopes that the Office will continue to provide technical assistance to help member States send more reports by 1 September.

31. Furthermore, the Committee notes that a number of countries sent some or all of the reports due by 1 September 2007 on ratified Conventions during the period between the end of the Committee's December 2007 session and the beginning of the May–June 2008 session of the International Labour Conference, or even during the Conference.⁹ The Committee emphasizes that this practice also disturbs the regular operation of the supervisory system and makes it more burdensome. It wishes to provide herein the list of countries which followed this practice in 2007–08, as requested by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards: Angola (Convention No. 29); Antigua and Barbuda (Conventions Nos 14, 17, 87, 98, 138); Armenia (Conventions Nos 111, 176); Bahamas (Conventions Nos 26, 29); Belize (Conventions Nos 81, 94, 95, 138, 141, 154); Brazil (Conventions Nos 122, 160, 168); Cambodia (Convention No. 138); Central African Republic (Convention No. 6); Chad (Conventions Nos 87, 98, 100, 111, 182); China – Hong Kong Special Administrative Region (Conventions Nos 97, 98); Congo (Conventions Nos 6, 11, 13, 26, 29, 81, 87, 95, 98, 100, 105, 111, 119, 138, 152, 182); Cyprus (Conventions Nos 97, 143, 183); Democratic Republic of the Congo (Conventions Nos 11, 26, 27, 87, 98, 100, 102, 111, 118, 138, 182); Denmark (Convention No. 152); Djibouti (Conventions Nos 19, 24, 37, 87, 100, 111, 125, 126, 138, 144, 182); Equatorial Guinea (Convention No. 111); Estonia (Conventions Nos 12, 19, 27, 81, 87, 100, 111, 122); Fiji (Convention No. 169); France (Conventions Nos 87, 88, 96, 97, 98, 152); France – French Guiana (Conventions Nos 5, 6, 12, 17, 19, 24, 29, 35, 36, 37, 38, 42, 81, 95, 105, 124, 144); France – Guadeloupe (Conventions Nos 12, 17, 19, 24, 42, 87, 98, 100, 111, 115, 144); France – Martinique (Conventions Nos 5, 6, 10, 12, 17, 19, 24, 35, 36, 37, 38, 42, 81, 87, 94, 95, 100, 105, 111, 123, 124, 129, 131, 144); France – Réunion (Convention No. 144); France – St Pierre and Miquelon (Conventions Nos 12, 17, 19, 24, 42, 87, 98, 100, 111, 122, 144); Gambia (Convention No. 29); Hungary (Convention No. 24); Iraq (Conventions Nos 13, 22, 23, 42, 94, 95, 98, 100, 108, 115, 120, 136, 147, 167); Kiribati (Conventions Nos 87, 98); Liberia (Conventions Nos 29, 87, 98); Malawi (Conventions Nos 29, 97, 105, 138, 182); Malaysia (Conventions Nos 29, 81, 95, 123, 138, 182); Malaysia – Sabah (Conventions Nos 94, 97); Malaysia – Sarawak (Conventions Nos 19, 94); Malta (Conventions Nos 32, 77, 78, 95, 124, 131); Mongolia (Convention No. 29); Netherlands – Netherlands Antilles (Conventions Nos 10, 29, 33, 90, 94, 95, 105); Nigeria (Conventions Nos 26, 29, 81, 95, 105, 111); Pakistan (Convention No. 32); Panama (Conventions Nos 81, 94); Papua New Guinea (Conventions Nos 26, 27, 29, 99, 105, 138, 182); Peru (Conventions Nos 26, 27, 29, 59, 71, 77, 78, 79, 81, 90, 99, 105, 138, 152); San Marino (Conventions Nos 98, 100, 111, 119, 138, 142, 144, 148, 150, 151, 154, 156, 159, 161); Senegal (Conventions Nos 6, 10, 13, 26, 95, 102, 120, 121, 182); Seychelles (Convention No. 155); Slovakia (Conventions Nos 27, 182); Slovenia (Conventions Nos 27, 29, 32, 81, 90, 97, 105, 129, 131, 138, 143, 173); United Republic of Tanzania (Convention No. 94); Uganda (Conventions Nos 17, 138, 162, 182); United Kingdom – Bermuda (Conventions Nos 10, 29, 59, 94, 105); United Kingdom – Gibraltar (Conventions Nos 29, 59, 81, 87, 100); Uzbekistan (Conventions Nos 29, 98, 100, 105, 111, 122).

Supply of first reports

32. A total of 94 of the 164 first reports due on the application of ratified Conventions were received by the time that the Committee's session ended, compared to last year when 118 of the 212 first reports due had been received. However, a number of countries have failed to supply first reports, some of which are more than a year overdue. Thus, certain first reports on ratified Conventions have not been received for a certain number of years from the following 16 member States:

- since 1992 – Liberia (Convention No. 133);
- since 1994 – Kyrgyzstan (Convention No. 111);
- since 1998 – Equatorial Guinea (Conventions Nos 68, 92);
- since 1999 – Turkmenistan (Conventions Nos 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111);

- since 2002 – Gambia (Conventions Nos 105, 138), Saint Kitts and Nevis (Conventions Nos 87, 98), Saint Lucia (Convention No. 182);
- since 2003 – Dominica (Convention No. 182), Gambia (Convention No. 182);
- since 2004 – Antigua and Barbuda (Conventions Nos 161, 182), Dominica (Conventions Nos 144, 169), The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (Convention No. 182);
- since 2005 – Liberia (Conventions Nos 81, 144, 150, 182);
- since 2006 – Dominica (Conventions Nos 135, 147, 150), Kyrgyzstan (Conventions Nos 17, 184); and
- since 2007: Armenia (Conventions Nos 14, 150, 160, 173); Chad (Convention No. 138); Lao People's Democratic Republic (Conventions Nos 138, 182); Saint Kitts and Nevis (Convention No. 138); Sao Tome and Principe (Conventions Nos 135, 138, 151, 154, 155, 182, 184); Seychelles (Conventions Nos 73, 144, 147, 152, 161, 180); Tajikistan (Convention No. 182) and The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (Convention No. 144).

33. The Committee, like the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, wishes to emphasize the importance of first reports. They provide the basis on which the Committee makes its initial assessment of the observance of ratified Conventions by member States. The Committee urges the governments concerned to make a special effort to supply these reports.

Replies to the comments of the supervisory bodies

34. Governments are requested to reply in their reports to the observations and direct requests made by the Committee. The majority of governments have provided the replies requested. In accordance with the established practice, the Office has written to all the governments which failed to provide such replies requesting them to supply the necessary information. Of the 35 governments to which such letters were sent, only five have provided the information requested.

35. The Committee regrets that there are still many cases of failure to reply to its comments in which, either:

- (a) of all the reports requested from governments, no reply has been received; or
- (b) the reports received contained no reply to most of the Committee's comments (observations and/or direct requests), and/or did not reply to the letters sent by the Office.

36. In all, there were 519 cases of no response (concerning 46 countries).¹⁰ There were 555 such cases (concerning 49 countries) last year. Under these conditions, the Committee is bound to repeat the observations or direct requests already made on the Conventions in question.

37. The failure of the governments concerned to fulfil their obligations considerably hinders the work of the Committee of Experts and that of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee cannot overemphasize the importance of ensuring the dispatch of the reports and replies to its comments.

B. Examination of reports on ratified Conventions by the Committee of Experts

38. In examining the reports received on ratified Conventions and Conventions declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories, in accordance with its normal practice, the Committee assigned to each of its members the initial responsibility for a group of Conventions. Reports received early enough are sent to the members concerned in advance of the Committee's session. The members submit their preliminary conclusions on the instruments for which they are responsible to the Committee in plenary sitting for discussion and approval. Decisions on comments are adopted by consensus.

Observations and direct requests

39. In many cases, the Committee has found that no comment is called for regarding the manner in which a ratified Convention has been implemented. In other cases, however, the Committee has found it necessary to draw the attention of the governments concerned to the need to take further action to give effect to certain provisions of Conventions or to supply additional information on given points. As in previous years, its comments have been drawn up in the form either of "observations", which are reproduced in the report of the Committee, or "direct requests", which are not published in the Committee's report, but are communicated directly to the governments concerned.¹¹

40. The Committee's observations appear in Part II (sections I and II) of this report, together with a list under each Convention of any direct requests. An index of all observations and direct requests, classified by country, is provided in Appendix VII to the report.

Special notes

41. As in the past, the Committee has indicated by special notes at the end of the observations (traditionally known as footnotes) the cases in which, because of the nature of the problems encountered in the application of the Conventions concerned, it has seemed appropriate to ask the government to supply a report earlier than would otherwise have been the case and, in some instances, to supply full particulars to the Conference at its next session in June 2009.

42. In order to identify cases for which it inserts special notes, the Committee uses the basic criteria described below, while taking into account the following three general considerations. First, these criteria are indicative. In exercising its discretion in the application of these criteria, the Committee may also have regard to the specific circumstances of the country and the length of the reporting cycle. Second, these criteria are applicable to cases in which an earlier report is requested, often referred to as a "single footnote", as well as to cases in which the government is requested to provide detailed information to the Conference, often referred to as a "double footnote". The difference between these two categories is one of degree. Finally, a serious case otherwise justifying a special note to provide full particulars to the Conference (double footnote) might only be given a special note to provide an early report (single footnote) when there has been a recent discussion of that case in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards.

43. The criteria to which the Committee has regard are the following:

- the seriousness of the problem; in this respect, the Committee emphasizes that an important consideration is the necessity to view the problem in the context of a particular Convention and to take into account matters involving fundamental rights, workers' health, safety and well-being, as well as any adverse impact, including at the international level, on workers and other categories of protected persons;
- the persistence of the problem;
- the urgency of the situation; the evaluation of such urgency is necessarily case-specific, according to standard human rights criteria, such as life-threatening situations or problems where irreversible harm is foreseeable; and
- the quality and scope of the government's response in its reports or the absence of response to the issues raised by the Committee, including cases of clear and repeated refusal on the part of a State to comply with its obligations.

44. At its 76th Session (November–December 2005), the Committee decided that the identification of cases in respect of which a government is requested to provide detailed information to the Conference would be a two-stage process: first, the expert initially responsible for a particular group of Conventions recommends to the Committee the insertion of special notes; second, in light of all the recommendations made, the Committee will, after discussion, take a final, collegial decision once it has reviewed the application of all the Conventions.

45. This year, under the present reporting cycle¹² the Committee has requested early reports after an interval of either one or two years, according to the circumstances, in the following cases:

¹² After the first report, subsequent reports are requested every two years for fundamental and priority Conventions and every five years for other Conventions (GB.258/6/19).

Practical application

48. It is customary for the Committee to note the information contained in the governments' reports allowing it to appreciate the application of the Conventions in practice, such as information relating to judicial decisions, statistics and labour inspection. The supply of this information is requested in almost all report forms, as well as the specific terms of some Conventions.

49. The Committee notes that 347 reports received this year contain information on the practical application of Conventions. Of these, 43 reports contain information on case law. The Committee also notes that 304 of the reports contain information on statistics and labour inspection.

50. In the same way as the Committee on the Application of Standards of the 97th Session of the Conference (May–June 2008), the Committee wishes to emphasize to governments the importance of submitting such information, since it is indispensable for completing the examination of national legislation and for helping the Committee to identify the issues arising from real problems of application in practice. The Committee also wishes to encourage employers' and workers' organizations to submit clear and up to date information on the application of the Conventions in practice.

Cases of progress

51. Following its examination of the reports supplied by governments, and in accordance with its standard practice, the Committee refers in its comments to cases in which it expresses its satisfaction or interest at the progress achieved in the application of the respective Conventions. Over the years, the Committee has developed a general approach, described below, concerning the identification of cases of progress. First, the Committee emphasizes that an expression of progress can refer to different kinds of measures. In the final instance, the Committee will exercise its discretion in noting progress having regard in particular to the nature of the Convention, as well as to the specific circumstances of the country.

52. Since first identifying cases of satisfaction in its report in 1964,¹³ the Committee has continued to follow the same general criteria. The Committee expresses satisfaction in cases in which, following comments it has made on a specific issue, governments have taken measures through either the adoption of an amendment to the legislation or a significant change in the national policy or practice, thus achieving fuller compliance with their obligations under the respective Conventions. The reason for identifying cases of satisfaction is twofold: to place on record the Committee's appreciation of the positive action taken by governments in response to its comments, and to provide an example to other governments and social partners which have to address similar issues. In expressing its satisfaction, the Committee indicates to governments and the social partners that it considers the specific matter resolved. In so doing, the Committee must emphasize that an expression of satisfaction is limited to the particular issue at hand and the nature of the measure taken by the government concerned. Therefore, in the same comment, the Committee may express satisfaction on a particular issue, while raising other important issues which in its view have not been addressed in a satisfactory manner. Further, if the satisfaction relates to the adoption of legislation, the Committee may also consider appropriate follow-up on its practical application.

53. As regards the visibility and impact that cases of progress may have, the Committee welcomed the discussion at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session (May–June 2008) of the application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), in Sweden.

54. Details concerning these cases are to be found in Part II of this report and cover 49 instances in which measures of this kind have been taken in 40 countries. The full list is as follows:

55. Thus the total number of cases in which the Committee has been led to express its satisfaction at the progress achieved following its comments has risen to 2,669 since the Committee began listing them in its report.

56. Within cases of progress, the distinction between cases of satisfaction and cases of interest was formalized in 1979.¹⁴ In general, cases of interest cover measures that are sufficiently advanced to justify the expectation that further progress would be achieved in the future and regarding which the Committee would want to continue its dialogue with the government and the social partners. This may include: draft legislation before parliament, or other proposed legislative changes not yet forwarded or available to the Committee; consultations within the government and with the social partners; new policies; and the development and implementation of activities within the framework of a technical cooperation project or following technical assistance or advice from the Office. Judicial decisions, according to the level of the court, the subject matter and the force of such decisions in a particular legal system would normally be considered as cases of interest unless there was a compelling reason to note a particular judicial decision as a case of satisfaction. The Committee may also note as cases of interest progress made by a State, province or territory in the framework of a federal system. The Committee's practice has developed to such an extent that cases in which it expresses interest may now also encompass a variety of new or innovative measures which have not necessarily been requested by the Committee. The paramount consideration is that the measures contribute to the overall achievement of the objectives of a particular Convention.

Cases of good practices

58. In accordance with the decision taken at its 78th Session (November–December 2007), the Committee will henceforth highlight cases of good practices to enable governments to emulate these in advancing social progress and to serve as a model for other countries to assist them in the implementation of ratified Conventions. At its 79th Session (November–December 2008), the Committee, on the recommendation of its subcommittee on working methods, agreed on general criteria that it would apply to identify cases of good practices. This is set out below. The Committee also agreed to apply the two-stage process used by it for the identification of cases with respect to governments that are required to supply full particulars to the Conference (the so-called “double footnotes”) and referred to in paragraph 44 above.

59. In agreeing on the criteria for cases of good practices, the Committee noted that mere compliance with the requirements of the Convention would not be sufficient as this is what the obligation of the member State requires. At the same time, such an identification of a case of good practices does not in any way add to the obligations that member States have under the Conventions they have ratified. The Committee also recognized that a certain caution would need to be exercised in the identification of good practices so as to minimize the possibility that such practices might in hindsight be viewed as unsatisfactory. Bearing in mind these aspects, the Committee agreed on the following three criteria, on the understanding that they were indicative and not exhaustive. First, the practice should indicate a new approach to improve or achieve compliance with the Convention and could be used as a model for other countries in implementing the particular Convention. Second, the practice reflects an innovative or creative way of either implementing the Convention or addressing difficulties which arise in its application. Third, recognizing that Conventions lay down minimum standards, the practice provides an example of a country extending the application or coverage of the Convention to enhance the objectives of the Convention, in particular where it contains flexibility clauses.

60. Details concerning the cases in question are to be found in Part II of this report. The full list is as follows:

Cases in which the need for technical assistance has been highlighted

61. The combination of the work of the supervisory bodies and the practical guidance given to member States through technical cooperation and assistance has always been one of the key dimensions of the ILO supervisory system. Further, since 2005, at the initiative of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, there has been heightened attention given to the complementarity between the examination by the ILO supervisory bodies and the Office's technical assistance. As pointed out in paragraphs 1318 of the General Report, this has led to an enhanced follow-up of cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations. In addition, the Conference Committee has made more systematic references to technical assistance in its conclusions regarding individual cases concerning the application of ratified Conventions. The aim of this strengthened combination between the work of the supervisory bodies and the Office's technical assistance is to provide an effective framework to member States for full compliance with their standards-related obligations including in the implementation of the Conventions which they have ratified.

62. In this context, the Committee has decided to highlight the cases for which, in the Committee's view, technical assistance would be particularly useful in helping member States to address gaps in law and in practice in the implementation of ratified Conventions. Details of these cases can be found in Part II of the report of the Committee of Experts. The full list is as follows:

Questions concerning the application of certain Conventions

63. A general observation, which appears as an introduction to the individual examination of reports due on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), deals with the issue of the application of this Convention to the export processing zones' (EPZ) workers.

64. A general observation, which appears as an introduction to the individual examination of reports due on the application of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), deals with the issue of light work activities that may be undertaken by children.

65. A general observation, which appears as an introduction to the individual examination of reports due on the application of the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), deals with the application of this Convention.

66. A general observation, which appears as an introduction to the individual examination of reports due on the application of the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), addresses the issue of the establishment of appropriate and effective mechanism for the consultation and participation of indigenous and tribal people regarding matters that concern them.

67. A general observation, which appears as an introduction to the individual examination of reports due on the application of the social security Conventions, deals with the application of these Conventions in the context of the global financial crisis.

Comments made by employers' and workers' organizations

68. At each session, the Committee draws the attention of governments to the important role of employers' and workers' organizations in the application of Conventions and Recommendations. Moreover, it highlights the fact that numerous Conventions require consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, or their collaboration in a variety of measures. The Committee notes that almost all governments have indicated in the reports supplied under articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution the representative organizations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution, they have communicated copies of the reports supplied to the Office. However, the Committee notes an increase this year in the number of governments which did not indicate in their reports the representative organizations of employers and workers to which copies of the reports shall be communicated. It emphasizes in this respect that, for the first time, it had to make an observation to two countries which had failed to provide this indication for the third consecutive year.¹⁵ The Committee hopes that in the future all of the governments concerned will comply with this constitutional obligation.

69. Since its last session, the Committee has received 630 comments (compared to 532 last year), 57 of which were communicated by employers' organizations and 573 by workers' organizations. The Committee recalls the importance it attaches to this contribution by employers' and workers' organizations to the work of the supervisory bodies. This contribution is essential for the Committee's evaluation of the application of ratified Conventions in law and in practice.

70. Of the majority of the comments received, 596 relate to the application of ratified Conventions (see Appendix III).¹⁶ Some 352 of these comments relate to the application of fundamental Conventions and 244 concern the application of other Conventions. Moreover, 34 comments concern reports provided by governments under article 19 of the Constitution on the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1982 (No. 155), the Protocol of 2002 to the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981, and the Occupational Safety and Health Recommendation, 1981 (No. 164).¹⁷

71. The Committee notes that, of the comments received this year, 457 were transmitted directly to the Office which, in accordance with the practice established by the Committee, referred them to the governments concerned for comment. The Committee emphasizes that comments submitted by employers' and workers' organizations should be received by the Office by 1 September at the latest to allow governments to have a reasonable time to respond, thereby enabling the Committee to examine the issues in question at its session in November the same year. Comments received later than 1 September will be examined by the Committee at its session the following year. In 173 cases, the governments transmitted the comments with their reports, sometimes adding their own comments.

72. The Committee also examined a number of other comments by employers' and workers' organizations, consideration of which had been postponed from its previous session because the comments of the organizations or the replies of the governments had arrived just before, during or just after the session. It again had to postpone until its next session the examination of a number of comments when they were received too close to or even during the Committee's present session, in particular to allow reasonable time for the governments concerned to make comments.

73. The Committee notes that in general the employers' and workers' organizations endeavoured to gather and present elements of law and fact on the application in practice of ratified Conventions. The Committee recalls that it is essential for the organizations, when referring specifically to the Convention or Conventions deemed relevant, to provide detailed information that has real additional value with regard to the information provided by the governments and the issues addressed in the Committee's comments. Such information should help to update or renew the analysis of the application of Conventions and emphasize real problems concerning application in practice. The Committee invites the organizations interested to request technical assistance from the Office to this end.

74. At its 77th Session (November–December 2006), the Committee gave the following guidance to the Office as to the usual procedure to be followed in determining the treatment of comments received from workers' and employers' organizations in a non-reporting year.

75. Where these comments simply repeat comments made in previous years, or refer to matters already raised by the Committee, they will be examined in the normal two-year or five-year cycle, when the government's report is due, and there will be no request for a report outside that cycle. This procedure will also apply in the case of comments which provide additional information on law and practice concerning matters already raised by the Committee, or on minor legislative changes.

76. The position is different where the comments raise serious allegations of important acts of non-compliance with particular Conventions. In this case, where the allegations appear sufficiently substantiated, there will be a request for the government to reply to these allegations outside the normal cycle and the Committee will consider the comments in the year in which they have been received. This procedure will also apply to comments referring to important legislative changes, or to proposals which have a fundamental impact on the application of a Convention; and, further, to comments which refer to minor, new legislative proposals or draft laws, not yet examined by the Committee, where its early examination may assist the government at the drafting stage.

77. The aim of this guidance is to provide assistance and to achieve consistency in dealing with such comments.

¹⁵ See Part II of the present report, pp. 43–703.

¹⁷ See Report III (Part 1B) of the present report containing the General Survey.

78. Part II of this report contains most of the observations made by the Committee on cases in which the comments raised matters relating to the application of ratified Conventions. Where appropriate, other comments are examined in requests addressed directly to the governments.

C. Submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities (article 19, paragraphs 5, 6 and 7, of the Constitution)

79. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee this year examined the following information supplied by the governments of member States pursuant to article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization:

- (a) information on the steps taken to submit to the competent authorities the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 95th Session (Convention No. 187 and Recommendations Nos 197 and 198) on 16 June 2006;
- (b) information on the steps taken to submit to the competent authorities the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 96th Session (Convention No. 188 and Recommendation No. 199) on 14 June 2007;
- (c) replies to the observations and direct requests made by the Committee at its 78th Session (November–December 2007).

80. Appendix IV of Part Two of the report contains a summary indicating, where appropriate, the name of the competent authority to which the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 95th and 96th Sessions were submitted and the date of submission.

81. Other statistical information is to be found in Appendices V and VI of Part Two of the report. Appendix V, compiled from information sent by governments, shows where each member State stands in terms of its constitutional obligation of submission. Appendix VI shows the overall situation of instruments adopted since the 51st Session (June 1967) of the Conference. The statistical data in Appendices V and VI are regularly updated by the competent branches of the Office and can be accessed via the Internet.

95th Session

82. The Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention (No. 187) and Recommendation No. 197 and the Employment Relationship Recommendation (No. 198) were to be submitted to the competent authorities within 12 months or, under exceptional circumstances, within 18 months of the closure of the session of the Conference, that is by 16 June 2007 or 16 December 2007, respectively. In all, 26 governments out of the 178 member States concerned have sent information on the steps taken in this regard: Australia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Belgium, Cyprus, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Eritrea, Estonia, Finland, Grenada, Guyana, India, Republic of Moldova, Namibia, Nicaragua, Netherlands, Peru, Serbia, Singapore, South Africa, Sweden, Switzerland, Trinidad and Tobago, United States and Zimbabwe.

83. The Committee welcomes the entry into force on 20 February 2009 of Convention No. 187, following the registration of seven ratifications (Cuba, Czech Republic, Finland, Japan, Republic of Korea, Sweden and United Kingdom).

96th Session

84. At its 96th Session in May–June 2007, the Conference adopted the Work in Fishing Convention (No. 188) and Recommendation No. 199. The 12-month period for submission to the competent authorities of Convention No. 188 and Recommendation No. 199 ended on 14 June 2008, and the 18-month period on 14 December 2008. In all, 62 governments out of the 178 member States concerned have sent new information on the steps taken in this regard: Armenia, Austria, Bahrain, Belarus, Benin, Brazil, Bulgaria, Cameroon, China, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Ecuador, Egypt, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Guatemala, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, Islamic Republic of Iran, Israel, Italy, Japan, Republic of Korea, Lebanon, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malawi, Mauritania, Mauritius, Morocco, Myanmar, Namibia, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Oman, Philippines, Poland, Romania, San Marino, Saudi Arabia, Serbia, Singapore, Slovakia, Slovenia, South Africa, Spain, Switzerland, United Republic of Tanzania, Thailand, Tunisia, Turkey, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United States, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

Cases of progress

85. The Committee notes with interest the information sent in 2008 by the Governments of Grenada, Namibia and Peru. It welcomes the efforts made by these two Governments to make up for the significant delay in submission and thus fulfil their obligation to submit to their parliamentary bodies the instruments adopted by the Conference over a number of years.

Special problems

86. To facilitate the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards, this report only mentions the governments which have not provided any information on submission to the competent authorities of instruments adopted by the Conference for at least the seven sessions held from May–June 2000 (i.e. from the 88th Session to the 95th Session in May–June 2006). This time frame was deemed long enough to warrant inviting Government delegations to a special sitting of the Conference Committee so that they could account for the delays in submission.

87. The Committee notes that at the closure of its 79th Session, on 12 December 2008, 50 governments are in this category: Antigua and Barbuda, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Burkina Faso, Cambodia, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, Comoros, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Croatia, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Gambia, Georgia, Ghana, Guinea, Haiti, Ireland, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kiribati, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mozambique, Nepal, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Rwanda, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Spain, Sudan, Tajikistan, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkmenistan, Uganda, Uzbekistan and Zambia.

88. The Committee is aware of the exceptional circumstances that have affected these countries for many years and knows that they often lack the appropriate institutions to discharge the obligation of submission.

89. In this regard, the Committee previously noted its concern about the fact that by submitting and ratifying the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), a very large number of governments avoided being placed in the category of States that had not submitted any of the instruments adopted over the "last seven sessions" of the Conference, even though they were significantly behind with regard to submission.

90. The present report shows that 50 governments have failed to provide information on the submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted by the Conference over the seven sessions considered as the period of reference in 2008 (i.e. from the 88th Session in May–June 2000 to the 95th Session in May–June 2006).

91. These countries have been identified in the observations published in this report and the instruments which have not been submitted are indicated in the statistical appendices. The Committee therefore considers it useful to draw the attention of these countries, listed in paragraph 87, to this matter so that they can immediately, as a matter of urgency, take the appropriate measures to bring themselves up to date.

92. The Committee also hopes that the government authorities and the social partners in these countries will be the first to benefit from the measures that the Office will take to assist them in the steps required for the rapid submission to the legislative body of the pending instruments.

Comments of the Committee and replies from governments

93. As in its previous reports, the Committee makes individual observations, in section III of Part Two of this report, on the points that should be brought to the special attention of governments. Observations are made in cases where there has been no information for five or more sessions of the Conference. Furthermore, requests for additional information on other points have been addressed directly to a number of countries (see list of direct requests at the end of section III).

94. The Committee hopes that the 79 observations and 41 direct requests that it is addressing this year to governments will enable them to better discharge their constitutional obligation of submission, thereby contributing to the promotion of the standards adopted by the Conference.

95. As the Committee has already pointed out, it is important that governments send the information and documents required by the questionnaire at the end of the Memorandum adopted by the Governing Body in March 2005. The Committee must receive, for examination, a summary or a copy of the documents submitting the instruments to the parliamentary bodies and be informed of the proposals made as to the action to be taken on them. The obligation of submission is discharged only once the instruments adopted by the Conference have been submitted to the legislature and the competent authorities have taken a decision on them. The Office has to be informed of this decision, as well as of the submission of instruments to the competent authorities.

96. The Committee hopes to be able to note progress in this matter in its next report. It again reminds governments that they may seek technical assistance from the ILO, particularly through the standards specialists in the field.

D. Instruments chosen for reports under article 19 of the Constitution

97. In accordance with the decision taken by the Governing Body,¹⁸ governments were requested to supply reports under article 19 of the Constitution on the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), the Protocol of 2002 to the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981, and the Occupational Safety and Health Recommendation, 1981 (No. 164).

¹⁸ Document GB.291/9(Rev.), para. 73.

98. A total of 492 reports were requested and 262 were received.¹⁹ This represents 53.25 per cent of the reports requested.

99. The Committee notes with regret that, for the past five years, none of the reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution has been received from the following 21 countries: Cape Verde, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Gambia, Guinea, Kyrgyzstan, Liberia, Russian Federation, Saint Kitts and Nevis, San Marino, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Tajikistan, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Timor-Leste, Togo, Turkmenistan, Uganda, Uzbekistan, Vanuatu.

100. The Committee once again urges governments to provide the reports requested so that its General Surveys can be as comprehensive as possible. It hopes that the Office will supply all the necessary technical assistance to this end.

101. Part III of this report (issued separately as Report III (Part 1B)) contains the General Survey on occupational safety and health. In accordance with the practice followed in previous years, the survey has been prepared on the basis of a preliminary examination by a working party comprising three members of the Committee.

III. Highlights and major trends

102. In accordance with its decision at its 78th Session (November–December 2007),²⁰ the Committee considers that it is useful to draw attention to the following highlights and major trends in relation to topical issues arising from the reports that it has examined this year.

103. As a preliminary note, the Committee wishes to highlight the adoption by the International labour Conference at its 97th Session (May–June 2008) of the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization. The Committee welcomes the reaffirmation of the decisive role that the ILO has to play in promoting and achieving progress and social justice in the current context of globalization, and the particular importance of international labour standards for this purpose. The Committee further notes the adoption by the Conference, also at its 97th Session, of a resolution on strengthening the ILO's capacity to assist its Members' efforts to reach its objectives in the context of globalization, in accordance with which "the provisions of the Declaration and its implementation should not duplicate the ILO's existing supervisory mechanisms, and ... its implementation should not increase the reporting obligations of member States".²¹ In the context of the discussion of its working methods, and also in the special sitting with the Vice-Chairpersons of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, the Committee of Experts discussed the issue of the implications of the 2008 Declaration mainly in relation to the General Surveys.

A. Sixtieth anniversary of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

104. In the 60th anniversary year of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee of Experts wishes to emphasize the fundamental importance it attaches to freedom of association as a core enabling right, essential to the meaningful attainment of all other rights at work. This has been firmly anchored in the 2008 Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, which highlights this right as particularly important to the attainment of the four strategic objectives of the ILO. Respect for freedom of association at the workplace goes hand in hand with respect for the basic civil liberties and human rights inherent to human dignity. Yet the Committee regrets to observe that billions of workers in the world remain deprived of this fundamental right in law or in practice. In the first instance, the Committee deeply regrets that Convention No. 87 lags behind as the least ratified of the fundamental Conventions. Moreover, among the 33 member States that have not ratified this Convention, one can find several of the most populous nations of the world. The Committee echoes the Director-General's solemn call to all those countries that have not yet ratified the Convention to make concerted efforts to do so by 2015, the proposed goal for the universal ratification of the fundamental Conventions. Recognizing significant organizational deficits in law and in practice for workers in export processing zones and for those making up the informal economy, among many other groups of vulnerable workers, the Committee has also decided to make a general observation in its report this year to highlight its concern and requests further information from governments in this regard.

B. Fiftieth anniversary of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)

105. This year, the Committee celebrates the 50th anniversary of the adoption of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). The Convention was forward-looking in 1958, and remains the most comprehensive, dedicated international instrument on non-discrimination and equality in employment and occupation. It is intrinsically linked to the ILO's mission to promote social justice through securing decent work for all, as most recently reaffirmed in the 2008 ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization. On this 50th anniversary of the Convention, it is appropriate to highlight some of the progress that has been made in its implementation and to reflect on means of overcoming the remaining obstacles to equality.

The starting point

106. In the process of applying the Convention, it is essential to acknowledge that no society is free from discrimination and that continuous action is required to address it. However, a few governments continue to assert that discrimination does not exist in their countries and declare that no action is required to apply the Convention. The Committee considers that such a position is contrary to the spirit of the Convention and is a considerable obstacle to its implementation. As already stated in its 1988 General Survey, the promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment is not aimed at a stable situation but achieved in successive stages in the course of which the national equality policy must be adjusted to newly emerging forms of discrimination for which solutions must be found.

National policy on equality of opportunity and treatment

107. Progress made. When assessing whether a given country has declared and is pursuing a national policy on equality of opportunity and treatment in accordance with the Convention, the Committee has been guided by the criteria of effectiveness, taking into account the specific circumstances of each country. In this context, the Committee wishes to recall that under Article 3(f) of the Convention, ratifying States have the obligation to provide information regularly on the measures taken to promote equality and also to indicate "the results secured by such action". While information is often provided on the various measures taken, the Committee is obliged regularly to request information on the impact of these measures. The Committee notes that an increasing number of countries apply the Convention through a combination of legislative and administrative measures, public policies, practical programmes aimed at preventing discrimination and redressing de facto inequalities, and through the establishment of national equality commissions or other specialized bodies mandated to promote equality and to deal with complaints.

Legislation

108. Important legislative developments. The Committee has been able to note considerable progress in the adoption of legal provisions on equality and non-discrimination based on the grounds enumerated in the Convention. Article 1(1)(a) of the Convention requires ratifying countries to ensure protection against discrimination on all the seven enumerated grounds, namely race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction and social origin; Article 1(1)(b) acknowledges that new manifestations of discrimination will arise or be recognized, and envisages ratifying States determining additional grounds to be addressed under the Convention. Countries are increasingly making use of the possibility to determine additional grounds, and are taking measures, including legislative protection, to address discrimination based on additional grounds, such as age, health, disability, HIV/AIDS status, nationality, family status or responsibilities and sexual orientation. The Committee observes that in many cases discrimination in employment and occupation is not limited to discrimination on solely one ground. For example, sex-based discrimination frequently interacts with other forms of discrimination or inequality based on race, national extraction or religion or even age, migrant status, disability or health. In this regard, the Committee wishes to draw attention to the particular situation of migrant workers, including female domestic workers, indigenous women, and persons suffering from HIV/AIDS.

109. Though a number of countries already have general constitutional provisions regarding equality, these provisions, while important, have generally not proven to be sufficient in order to address specific cases of discrimination in employment and occupation. Some countries have more recently opted for comprehensive anti-discrimination legislation or have addressed discrimination in broader human rights legislation, while others have introduced new anti-discrimination and equality provisions into the existing labour laws. Given persisting patterns of discrimination, the Committee considers that in most cases comprehensive anti-discrimination legislation is needed to ensure the effective application of the Convention. The Committee has had the opportunity to examine a range of legislation, and notes a number of features that have effectively contributed to addressing discrimination and promoting equality: covering the broadest group of workers; providing a clear definition of direct and indirect discrimination; prohibiting discrimination at all stages of the employment process; explicitly assigning supervisory responsibilities to competent national authorities; providing dissuasive sanctions and appropriate remedies; shifting or reversing the burden of proof; providing protection from retaliation; allowing for affirmative action measures; and providing for the adoption and implementation of equality policies or plans at the workplace, as well as the collection of relevant data at different levels. The Committee has also welcomed the adoption in a number of countries of initiatives such as codes of practice or guidelines which provide further guidance concerning the prohibition and prevention of discrimination at work to complement the legislation.

110. Implementation gaps. The Committee still observes some important gaps in the implementation of the Convention. For example –

- Certain categories of workers such as casual workers, domestic workers and migrant workers often remain excluded from the protection against discrimination enshrined in national legislation.
- Some anti-discrimination laws do not cover all the grounds set out in the Convention.
- A ground frequently omitted in the legislation is social origin, which remains of importance as new forms of rigid social stratification develop.
- Protection against discrimination does not cover all aspects of employment and occupation, from recruitment to termination.

111. Another important implementation gap concerns sexual harassment, which is a serious form of sex discrimination and a violation of human rights at work. The Committee therefore recalls its 2002 general observation highlighting the importance of taking effective measures to prevent and prohibit both quid pro quo and hostile environment sexual harassment at work. Laws on sexual harassment often lack clear definitions and appropriate responses in terms of remedies and complaints mechanisms. Confining sexual harassment to criminal procedures has generally proven inadequate, as they may deal with the most serious cases, but not with the range of conduct in the context of work that should be addressed as sexual harassment, the burden of proof is higher and there is limited access to redress.

112. Discriminatory laws: Not yet relegated to the past. Despite the requirement under the Convention to repeal discriminatory legal provisions, such provisions still exist in a number of countries. For instance, laws still place limitations on the type of work women can do or exclude them from certain sectors or occupations, for instance in the judiciary or the police. Protective measures still exclude women from certain occupations based on stereotyped assumptions regarding their role and capabilities. In this regard, the Committee has pointed out that restrictions relating to the access of women to certain types of work should be related to maternity protection and not aimed at protecting women because of their sex or gender, based on stereotyped assumptions. Laws governing personal and family relations not yet providing for equal rights of men and women continue to impact on the enjoyment of equality with respect to work and employment, notably laws authorizing a husband to object to his wife working outside the home, or requiring the husband's permission before his wife can accept certain jobs.

Enforcement

113. A continuing challenge. The implementation of anti-discrimination legislation remains a challenge almost everywhere. Where no cases or a negligible number are being lodged, the Committee has queried whether this could indicate a lack of awareness of the principle of the Convention, lack of confidence in or absence of practical access to procedures, or fear of reprisals. It has invited member States to raise awareness of the legislation, to enhance the capacity of the responsible authorities, including judges, labour inspectors and other public officials, to identify and address such cases, and also to examine whether the applicable substantive and procedural provisions, in practice, allow victims of discrimination to bring their claims successfully. The Committee has also consistently stressed the need to collect and publish information on the nature and outcome of discrimination cases addressed by the competent bodies, including the courts, national human rights or equality institutions and the labour inspectorate, as a means of raising awareness of the legislation and of the avenues for dispute resolution, and as a basis for examining their effectiveness.

De facto inequality

114. Repealing discriminatory legislation and enacting and enforcing non-discrimination legislation, while clearly important, are not sufficient to eliminate de facto inequality in employment and occupation, which often results from discrimination that is deeply entrenched in tradition and societal values and manifests itself in a systematic and structural manner.

115. The many faces of sex discrimination. The gender pay gap remains high as well as occupational sex segregation, women are over-represented in informal and atypical jobs, they face greater barriers in gaining access to posts of responsibility, and continue to bear the unequal burden of family responsibilities. The Committee is concerned about the high participation of women in the informal economy in a number of countries, which often means that they are excluded from most of the legal and social protection and benefits available to those working in the formal sector. Such protection and benefits are also unavailable in some countries to workers in export processing zones, where the Committee has noted serious discriminatory practices against women. Discrimination against women still takes many forms and the Committee has found that in access to or retention of employment, criteria relating to marital status, family situation and family responsibilities still disproportionately affect women. Also, stereotyped assumptions regarding women's aspirations and capabilities, as well as their suitability for certain jobs, continue to lead to the segregation of men and women in education and training and consequently in the labour market.

116. Social justice for all: Still elusive. The Committee has also observed that labour market inequalities along ethnic and religious lines and discriminatory practices against indigenous and tribal peoples, members of ethnic minorities and migrant workers persist. Caste- and class-based discrimination remains pervasive in a number of countries. Women belonging to these groups are often disproportionately vulnerable to discrimination. The Committee notes that addressing discrimination against these groups, and the inequality in training, education, employment and occupation that affects them, is critical to development processes and to achieving social justice for all, especially given recent indications of re-emerging racism and intolerance, including religious intolerance.

A way forward

117. Proactive measures. Tackling de facto inequalities requires proactive approaches and measures, to achieve gender equality and to overcome discrimination of particularly vulnerable groups. Such measures have included affirmative action, awareness raising and training, and ensuring coherent policies in areas affecting equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation. Indirect discrimination and tackling structural disadvantage remains a serious concern. The special circumstances, human rights and needs and aspirations of the groups concerned need to be taken into account in the design and implementation of policies and programmes in the areas of training, skills development and employment promotion.

118. The need for more and better data. Some countries have put in place laws, policies and procedures that allow for the collection of appropriate sex-disaggregated statistical data as a means of identifying social and economic gaps between different groups of the population. At a global level, however, relevant data are available only to a limited extent. While data on the situation of men and women exist more often, data on ethnic or other social groups are being collected and made available by a far smaller number of countries. As appropriate data are crucial in order to set priorities and design appropriate measures to address discrimination and de facto inequalities, and are also indispensable in order to monitor and assess the impact and results achieved by the measures taken, the Committee has systematically called upon governments to collect and analyse relevant data.

The role of workers' and employers' organizations

119. Key players. In keeping with the spirit of the Convention, workers' and employers' organizations are playing an important role in promoting understanding, acceptance and the realization of the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation through the development and implementation of workplace policies and measures to ensure equality of opportunity and treatment and promote diversity at work. Trade unions in all regions have taken up anti-discrimination work, ranging from designing internal procedures to joining national public campaigns. Employers and employers' organizations have developed codes of conduct and implemented diversity management and training activities in a considerable number of countries. Collective bargaining has also been instrumental in securing the rights under the Convention in practice. The Committee stresses the need for full respect for freedom of association as a precondition to enable workers' and employers' organizations to carry out their important role in the context of the Convention, as social dialogue is key to addressing legislative and implementation gaps.

Conclusion

120. The application of the Convention has clearly contributed to the promotion and realization of equality of opportunity and treatment in employment and occupation and thus to social justice. Yet the goal of eliminating all discrimination in employment and occupation remains a distant one. Noting that at present 14 ILO member States have not yet ratified Convention No. 111, an instrument of fundamental and enduring importance, the Committee hopes that universal ratification will be achieved by 2015, as called for by the ILO Director-General.

C. Highlights concerning the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138)

121. Convention No. 138 is one of the eight fundamental Conventions of the ILO. It has currently been ratified by 151 countries. The Convention defines the ages under which it is prohibited to work or to let minors work. However, out of a concern to cover the multiplicity of situations, it introduces many elements of flexibility, allowing States various options and enabling them to exclude from the application of the Convention limited categories of employment or work "in respect of which special and substantial problems of application arise" (Article 4). The Convention is accordingly complex in its implementation, as it establishes specific ages and conditions for light work, hazardous types of work and the participation of minors in artistic performances.

122. The Committee has made a general observation on the Convention this year. It follows its previous general observation in 2003, which emphasized the gravity of the problem of child labour, the efforts needed for its eradication and the possibility of ILO technical assistance, also for the compilation of statistical data on the actual situation in each of the countries concerned. This year's general observation only covers the issue of "light work", which is authorized by the Convention (Article 7) in principle between the ages of 13 and 15 years and exceptionally between the ages of 12 and 14 years, under certain conditions and for certain types of work. The Committee believes that certain explanations on these aspects, backed up by tangible examples, are warranted because age conditions, the need to determine the types of light work that are authorized and the related conditions are often poorly understood by States and therefore likely to give rise to abuse.

123. This year, 97 reports were requested on the Convention and 72 were received. The reports received gave rise to 29 observations and 67 direct requests, including repetitions, with certain reports being covered by both an observation and a direct request: in total, the comments concern 69 countries. Of these, action taken in 11 cases was noted "with satisfaction" and in 30 cases "with interest". However, unfortunately, the progress noted is often very modest when compared with the global situation. According to the ILO's global figures, a total of 182 million children under 14 years of age work, or one in five in this age group.

124. Two related factors are bound to influence the situation of children who are compelled to work, the first of which is the economic situation of their country. In this respect, a report on 26 August 2008 by the World Bank indicates that the number of people earning less than US$1.25 a day fell by 500 million, from 52 per cent of the total population in 1981 to 26 per cent in 2005. However, this spectacular fall is not evenly distributed and has not benefited sub-Saharan African countries. This is undoubtedly the reason why this global decline in poverty has not yet resulted in a substantial decrease in child labour according to the reports received by the Committee of Experts.

125. The second factor relates to primary-school attendance rates. According to UNICEF, the total number of children in primary education rose from 647 million in 1999 to 688 million in 2005, with a clear improvement in sub-Saharan Africa (+36 per cent) and in South and West Asia (+22 per cent). This progress is essentially due to the efforts of the international community, with the commitment to eradicate illiteracy by 2015. The consequences for child labour are evident. Some countries are very likely to achieve the objective of universal primary education by 2015 (such as Benin and Zambia, where the school attendance rate has risen by 20 per cent in six years, but where there are still 450,000 children between the ages of 10 and 14 who work, and Uganda, where the number of children in school rose from 2.9 million to 7.2 million in 2002, although with 1.4 million children between 10 and 14 years still working). In contrast, the UNESCO Global Monitoring Report of 2008 entitled Education for All indicates that it is already clear that other countries will not achieve universal primary-school attendance by 2015 (such as Burkina Faso and the Dominican Republic).

126. Emphasis should also be placed on the role of the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (ILO-IPEC), which carries out action in agreement with the countries concerned in the context of ILO technical assistance. In addition to the Time-bound Programmes (TBPs), which focus on the worst forms of child labour, ILO-IPEC has formulated "contributions to the elimination of child labour" in African French- and Portuguese-speaking countries, Latin America and in certain other countries, such as Albania and Cambodia. But there are still countries in which the basis for action, in terms of statistical knowledge of the real situation, has not yet been achieved, such as China, Indonesia, Malaysia, Cameroon and Sudan.

127. Finally, even where the very positive action of ILO-IPEC offers tangible outcomes, its results, however welcome, may still appear derisory in quantitative terms. For example, in Peru the remarkable objective of ILO-IPEC is to remove 5,000 children from work between 2006 and 2010. But there are 1,219,000 working children between the ages of 6 and 13 years, some of whom, including girls, are down the mines! This amply illustrates the gigantic efforts that are still needed in the long term from the countries of the world which have the resources to do so.

D. Application of the ILO social security standards in the context of the global financial crisis

128. Many national economic indicators are giving the convergent message that the impact of the current financial crisis may be severe, long-lasting and global, thereby posing a real threat to the financial viability and sustainable development of social security systems and undermining the application of ILO social security standards. Banking, insurance and pension fund failures, followed by the closure of enterprises in the other sectors of the economy, are causing growing unemployment and reduced pensions. Social safety nets will come under increasing stress as the number of claimants increase while taxes and contributions to social security schemes decline. The huge cost of bank bailouts and stabilization measures taken by governments leaves national treasuries with little room for manoeuvre and constrains social spending. The Committee is led to observe that social security systems are set to experience the worst financial and economic crisis since the systems were first created. In this situation, the Committee is bound to remind governments that, under the ILO Conventions on social security, governments must accept general responsibility for the proper administration of the national social security institutions and for the due provision of the benefits; to enable them to effectively discharge this general responsibility, the Conventions place them under the obligation to “take all measures required for this purpose”.²²

Making enhanced social protection part of the solution

129. During the economic turbulence of the 1990s, financial pressures led some governments to adopt hasty measures and make cuts in social security expenditure. The Committee emphasized at that time that immediate financial pressures, however important, should not take precedence over the need to preserve the stability and effectiveness of social security systems, and that any reduction in their expenditure should be carried out within the framework of a coherent policy aimed at achieving viable long-term solutions ensuring the levels of protection guaranteed by the ILO standards. The Committee now wishes to reiterate this concern with even greater force: unless major countries adopt a coherent and comprehensive response to the global financial crisis, social protection mechanisms may be severely jeopardized and pushed well below the minimum levels established by Convention No. 102 over 50 years ago. Depending on how this crisis is managed, it has the potential to turn into a full-scale social and political crisis, resulting in a major setback for social progress worldwide.

130. Experience shows that social security and the overall economy are inseparable, particularly in periods of crisis, and need to be governed and managed together, at both the national and global levels. It means that bringing the economy out of the crisis requires enhanced measures of social protection and, indeed, making social security part of the solution. The Committee recommends basing these measures on the requirements of ILO Conventions, which have been drawn up by governments and social partners with the interests of the economy in mind so as to keep it working effectively. It cannot repeat too often that taking economic and social issues together in a synergetic approach is a precondition for good governance, in which international labour standards are instrumental. The Committee hopes that out of this crisis will emerge an understanding of the need to ensure full integration of the social dimension into the emerging post-crisis financial and economic order.

Rebalancing the public and private tiers of social security systems

131. In the 1990s, many governments reduced their role in discharging the responsibilities in relation to social security down to the mere provision of basic safety nets, while at the same time expanding the role of private insurers, enterprises and insured persons themselves. In these countries, the move to privatization led to the gradual reduction of the public tier of social security, particularly in sickness and pension insurance. The Committee has emphasized that this transfer of responsibilities is not always compatible with the principle of collective financing and the general responsibility of the State for the proper administration of the system and the due provision of benefits. One of the negative consequences involved was the exclusion of the public authorities, social partners and insured persons from participating in the administration of social security schemes, thereby exposing their members to greater financial risks while removing state guarantees.

132. In the light of the recent developments, the Committee is bound to reaffirm that collective financing and the sharing of risks on as broad a basis as possible, combined with the transparent, accountable and participatory management of social security schemes under the overall responsibility and direct oversight of the State offer the best guarantees of the financial viability and sustainable development of social security. With the rapidly diminishing trust in private saving schemes, which have sustained severe financial losses, public opinion is becoming once again more receptive to the principles of social cohesion, collective risk sharing and the stability of public insurance schemes as preferable to the uncertainty of private systems. This may compel governments to find the new balance between the public and private tiers in the post-crisis social order.

Rebuilding the State’s institutional and regulatory capacity

133. When private schemes face the prospect of being unable to pay out expected benefits and with some even facing bankruptcy, governments must be ready to accept increased responsibility for the proper administration and supervision of such schemes, which may include taking them over in extreme cases. The global financial crisis calls for a State that is willing and able to effectively regulate markets by all appropriate means. In some countries, governments have already been forced to take on once again the responsibilities that they had previously ceded to private actors, particularly in the pension insurance sector. Rebuilding the State’s institutional and regulatory capacity to manage their expanding responsibilities now needs to be identified as a priority objective of international cooperation in the field of social security. The Director-General of the ILO has recently brought this issue to the fore in the multilateral system: “The capacity of governments has been reduced over the past decades with the belief that markets could deliver better development results on their own. It is now painfully clear that inclusive markets function best alongside a strong State. ... The multilateral system should identify rebuilding of state institutional capacity as a priority objective of development cooperation and emergency assistance.”²³ The prospects of overcoming the crisis are linked to more, and not less government regulation and, in this process, States can fully rely on the basic principles and provisions of the ILO social security standards.

Protecting social security resources

134. While it is clear that in the unprecedented conditions of the global financial crisis there is a manifold increase in the role of the State, the manner in which the State fulfils these responsibilities and obligations also takes on primary importance. Governments must see national social security schemes, both public and private, through the period of crisis in such a way as to ensure the lowest possible level of losses. They must manage the skyrocketing levels of budgetary deficit in such a way as not to endanger the social guarantees of the population. It is the view of the Committee that measures taken by governments to salvage private providers cannot be taken at the expense of cutting the resources available to public social security schemes. In seeking to manage the financial crisis by increasing public debt, governments must preserve the sustainability of social security funds. The Committee notes that a further increase in the social security deficit, which in many countries is already extremely high, will mean carrying over to future generations an even more significant proportion of the cost of social protection, which runs counter to the logic of sustainable development that underpins ILO social security standards. Continually rising levels of public debt are incompatible with the principles of good governance established by them. On the contrary, these principles require the State to clear former social security debts as soon as possible, make sufficient budgetary provision for future commitments and introduce governance rules to prevent the recurrence of debt in the future.

135. In conditions of financial and economic crisis, it may also be very tempting to tap the social security funds for many types of urgent measures intended to salvage enterprises, preserve jobs and kick-start economic growth. The Committee observes in this context that the diversion of social security resources for other purposes, however important they may be, is liable to adversely affect in the long term the sound management and financial balance of the system. There is therefore a pressing need for more thorough control to ensure that social allowances and subsidies granted out of public or social insurance funds, as well as various advantages and exemptions from the social security contributions, are used effectively and efficiently.

Bringing social insurance schemes back to normal parameters

136. During periods of crisis, no member State can discharge its general responsibility under ILO Conventions for the viability of its social security system without, at the same time, being committed to the obligation to achieve time-bound results and measurable outcomes for the people concerned. The Committee trusts that the measures adopted or envisaged by governments will be commensurate with the gravity of the financial situation and the primary responsibility of the State to ensure the viability and sustainable development of social security. It considers that returning to the financial equilibrium of social financing must constitute a priority for public authorities. While it is true that the provisions of ILO social security Conventions were not designed for the management of social security in a crisis situation, they nevertheless establish parameters compliance with which is intended to ensure the stability and sound governance of the system. A good policy to exit out of the crisis would consist of bearing these parameters in mind so as to allow the progressive return of the system to its normal condition, even though emergency measures may temporarily introduce significant corrections into these parameters. The role of the ILO social security standards takes on particular importance in ensuring the concerted recovery from the crisis by helping countries to bring their social security systems back to the initial internationally agreed parameters. Setting aside the diversity of national situations, it is in safeguarding these common parameters and values through periods of financial and economic turbulence that the system of international obligations that bind member States under the ILO social security Conventions has proved its full worth.

IV. Collaboration with other international organizations and functions relating to other international instruments

A. Cooperation in the field of standards with the United Nations, the specialized agencies and other international organizations

137. In the context of collaboration with other international organizations on questions concerning supervision of the application of international instruments relating to subjects of common interest, the United Nations, certain specialized agencies and other intergovernmental organizations with which the ILO has entered into special arrangements for this purpose, are asked whether they have information that might be useful for the Committee to examine how certain Conventions are being applied. This year, information has been received from the United Nations regarding the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) and the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), and from the United Nations Education, Science and Culture Organization (UNESCO) as regards the migrant workers Conventions, which the Committee took into account when examining the application of these instruments.

B. United Nations treaties concerning human rights

138. The Committee recalls that international labour standards and the provisions of related United Nations human rights treaties are complementary and mutually reinforcing. It emphasizes that continuing cooperation between the ILO and the United Nations with regard to the application and supervision of relevant instruments is necessary, particularly in view of the approach to development based on human rights adopted by the United Nations.

139. The Committee appreciates the efforts made by the Office to provide information on the application of international labour standards to the United Nations treaty bodies on a regular basis, in accordance with the existing arrangements between the ILO and the United Nations. The Committee considers that coherent international monitoring is an important basis for action to enhance the enjoyment of and compliance with economic, social and cultural rights at the national level. The Committee itself had the opportunity to continue its collaboration with the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in the context of the annual meeting between the two Committees which took place on 27 November 2008, at the invitation of the Friedrich Ebert Stiftung. This year, the meeting was dedicated to the 60th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the 50th anniversary of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). The right to equality and non-discrimination was selected as the theme for discussion.

140. With regard to the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights adopted by the Human Rights Council on 18 June 2008, the Committee notes that the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, when examining communications from individuals or groups of individuals claiming to be victims of a violation of rights set forth in the Covenant, may consult relevant documentation emanating from other United Nations bodies, as well as specialized agencies. The Committee considers it essential that its collaboration with the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights be strengthened in particular when the Optional Protocol will enter into force.

C. European Code of Social Security and its Protocol

141. In accordance with the supervisory procedure established under Article 74, paragraph 4 of the Code, and the arrangements made between the ILO and the Council of Europe, the Committee of Experts examined 20 reports on the application of the European Code of Social Security and, as appropriate, its Protocol. At the sitting in which the Committee examined the reports on the Code and its Protocol, the Council of Europe was represented by Ms Ana Gomez Heredero. The conclusions of the Committee regarding these reports will be sent to the Council of Europe for examination by its Committee of Experts on Standard-setting Instruments in the Field of Social Security. Once approved, the Committee's comments should lead to the adoption of resolutions by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on the application of the Code and the Protocol by the countries concerned.

142. With its dual responsibility for the application of the Code and international labour Conventions relating to social security, the Committee seeks to develop a coherent analysis of the application of European and international instruments and to coordinate the obligations of the States parties to these instruments. The Committee also draws attention to the national situations in which recourse to technical assistance of the Council of Europe and the Office may prove to be an effective means of improving the application of the Code.

143. Lastly, the Committee would like to express its appreciation for the invaluable assistance again rendered to it by the officials of the Office, whose competence and devotion to duty make it possible for the Committee to accomplish its increasingly voluminous and complex task in a limited period of time.

Geneva, 12 December 2008.

Part II. Observations concerning particular countries

I. Observations concerning reports on ratified Conventions (articles 22 and 35, paragraphs 6 and 8, of the Constitution)

General observations

Antigua and Barbuda

The Committee notes that the great majority of reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have been received, including 11 first reports due since 2004 and 2005. It notes in this respect that the Government benefited from the technical assistance of the Office in the context of a workshop organized in June–July 2008. The Committee welcomes the efforts made by the Government. It firmly hopes that the Government, where appropriate with the assistance of the Office, will soon submit the two first reports that are still due since 2004 on the application of Conventions Nos 161 and 182, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Armenia

The Committee notes that the majority of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received, including the first reports on Conventions Nos 14, 150, 160 and 173 (due since 2007). A total of 14 reports are still due. It notes that the tripartite working group responsible for the preparation of reports received technical advice from the Office in May 2008. The Committee hopes that the sustained technical assistance which has been provided to the Government for some time, as a result of which it has been able to overcome a significant backlog in the transmission of the reports due in previous years, will be continued, so that the efforts made by the Government can have a sustainable effect. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will soon provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Bangladesh

The Committee notes that, for the third consecutive year, the Government has not indicated, in the majority of the reports received, the representative organizations of employers and workers to which reports on the application of ratified Conventions shall be communicated in accordance with article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution. It also refers to the observations that it has been making for several years on the application of Convention No. 144. The Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to organize without delay consultations with the social partners concerning the preparation and communication of reports in accordance with its obligations under the Constitution and the aforementioned Convention.

Cape Verde

The Committee notes that, for the third consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that, as a result, 11 reports are now due. In its letter of 17 July 2008 following up on the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour

Conference (May–June 2008), the Office took the initiative of offering its technical assistance to the Government in light of the persistence of the difficulties relating to the sending of reports. According to the information provided to the Committee, this technical assistance should be provided in 2009. The Committee firmly hopes that, with the support of the Office, the Government will provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions in good time, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Chad

The Committee notes that the majority of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received, including the first report on the application of Convention No. 138, due since 2007. As a result, eight reports are now due. It notes that the Government and the social partners benefited from the Office's technical assistance in August 2008 in the context of a subregional training seminar on the preparation of reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in which emphasis was placed on Conventions Nos 138 and 182. The Committee has been informed that the remaining reports have been sent by the Government. The Committee firmly hopes that the reports concerned will be received in the near future and that the Government will accordingly have discharged in full its constitutional obligation.

Denmark

Faeroe Islands

The Committee notes with regret that, for the fourth consecutive year, the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been received and that 15 reports are therefore still due.

Greenland

The Committee notes that the reports due on the application of Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been received and that four reports are still due.

The Committee takes due note of the explanations provided by the Government representative to the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008) on the progress achieved in the dialogue that is being held with the second non-metropolitan territory referred to above. As the Office emphasized in its letter of 15 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards, the two Committees are following with heightened attention the question of the sending of reports concerning the application of Conventions declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories. The Committee recalls that the Government can have recourse to the Office's assistance, so that these non-metropolitan territories can benefit from the training programmes provided on the sending of reports. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without further ado so that lasting solutions can be identified for the provision of the reports due on the application of Conventions declared applicable to these territories, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Dominica

The Committee notes that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received, including the six first reports on the application of the following Conventions: Convention No. 182 (due since 2003); Conventions Nos 144 and 169 (since 2004); and Conventions Nos 135, 147 and 150 (since 2006). A total of 15 reports are still due. The Committee notes that the Government has not called upon the Office's technical assistance this year, even though it was invited to do so by the letter of 21 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008). The Government has also failed to reply to the letter from the standards specialist in the subregion drawing its attention once again to the matter in September 2008. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without further ado, including having recourse to the Office's technical assistance, for the provision of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Equatorial Guinea

The Committee notes that only one report on the application of ratified Conventions has been received this year and that 13 reports are still due, including the first reports on Conventions Nos 68 and 92, which have been due since 1998. In its letter of 17 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008), the Office took the initiative of offering its technical assistance to the Government in light of the persistence of the difficulties related to the sending of reports. The Committee notes in this respect that the Government and the social partners benefited in August 2008 from a subregional training seminar on the preparation of reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in which emphasis was placed on Conventions Nos 138 and 182. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay so as to send in good time all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Gambia

The Committee notes that only one report on the application of ratified Conventions has been received this year and that seven reports are still due, including the first reports due since 2002 on Conventions Nos 105 and 138 and since 2003 on Convention No. 182. It takes due note of the statement by the Government representative to the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008), referring to the problems of the capacity of the unit responsible and indicating that the Government would continue to seek the Office's technical assistance. In its letter of 17 July 2008, following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards, the Office indicated its availability to organize a tripartite seminar on the sending of reports. The Committee invites the Office to renew its offer of technical assistance and requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay for the provision of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Guinea

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that 39 reports are therefore still due. In its letter of 11 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008), the Office took the initiative of offering its technical assistance to the Government in light of the persistent difficulties related to the sending of reports. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including having recourse to the Office's technical assistance, so as to send all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions in good time, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Guinea-Bissau

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that 16 reports are therefore now due. It also notes that the Government benefited from the Office's technical assistance in May 2008 in the context of a training programme on the sending of reports. In its letter of 21 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008), the Office took the initiative of once again offering its technical assistance in light of the persistence of the difficulties related to the sending of reports. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including having recourse to the Office's technical assistance, with a view to sending all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions in good time, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Kyrgyzstan

The Committee notes that twenty-three reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have been received, including the first report on Convention No. 133, which has been due since 1995. The Government is accordingly pursuing the efforts undertaken since the previous year to make up the accumulated backlog in the sending of reports. A total of 17 reports are still due, including the first reports on Convention No. 111 (due since 1994) and on Conventions Nos 17 and 184 (due since 2006). The Committee welcomes the Government's commitment, which is resulting in tangible action to send the reports due with the support of the Office, from which it received technical assistance on three occasions this year. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will manage to provide all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions in good time, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Lao People's Democratic Republic

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received, including the two first reports due since 2007 on Conventions Nos 138 and 182. Five reports are still due. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including having recourse to the Office's technical assistance for the sending of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Liberia

The Committee notes that the Government has once again started sending reports this year after an interruption of eight years due to the national situation. As a result, 18 reports are still due, including the first reports due since 1992 on Convention No. 133 and since 2005 on Conventions Nos 81, 144, 150 and 182. As it indicated in its letter of 17 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008), the Office provided technical assistance to the Government and the social partners in October 2008 in the context of a tripartite workshop on the sending of reports. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will maintain the efforts made this year, where appropriate with the Office's assistance, and that it will be in a position to provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions in good time, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Saint Kitts and Nevis

The Committee notes that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received, including the first reports on Conventions Nos 87 and 98, due since 2002, and on Convention No. 138, due since 2007. As a result, nine reports are now due. The Committee takes due note of the statement by the Government representative to the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008) reporting a lack of resources. The Government has since reaffirmed its will to fulfil its obligations. In its letter of 21 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards, the Office took the initiative of once again offering its technical assistance to the Government in light of the persistence of difficulties relating to the sending of reports. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including having recourse to the Office's technical assistance, so as to provide all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions in good time, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Saint Lucia

The Committee notes that the efforts made last year have not been maintained this year and that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received, including the first report on Convention No. 182, due since 2002, with the result that nine reports are now due. In its letter of 21 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008), the Office took the initiative of once again offering its technical assistance to the Government. The Government has not replied to this offer and has also failed to reply to the letter from the standards specialist in the subregion once again drawing its attention to the matter in September 2008. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including having recourse to the Office's technical assistance, with a view to sending all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Saint Vincent and the Grenadines

The Committee notes that, for the third consecutive year, the Government has not indicated the representative organizations of employers and workers to which reports on the application of ratified Conventions shall be communicated in accordance with article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution. It hopes that the Government will be in a position to discharge without delay its constitutional obligation.

Sao Tome and Principe

The Committee notes that the efforts made last year have not been maintained this year and that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received, including the first reports on Conventions Nos 135, 138, 151, 154, 155, 182 and 184, due since 2007. As a result, 13 reports are now due. In its letter of 17 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008), the Office took the initiative of offering its technical assistance to the Government. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including having recourse to the Office's technical assistance, so as to send all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Seychelles

The Committee notes that the majority of reports on the application of ratified Conventions have been received, including the first reports due on Conventions Nos 81 and 155, due since 2007. The Committee welcomes the efforts made by the Government. Nine reports are still due, including the first reports on Conventions Nos 73, 144, 147, 152, 161 and 180, all due since 2007. In its letter of 21 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008), the Office indicated its availability to provide technical assistance to the Government. According to the information received by the Committee, the Office intends to organize this technical assistance in the very near future. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government, with the Office's assistance, will provide all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Sierra Leone

The Committee notes that, for the third consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that 20 reports now remain due. In its letter of 21 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008), the Office took the initiative of offering its technical assistance to the Government to help it overcome its persistent difficulties in an appropriate manner. According to the information provided to the Committee, this assistance should be provided in 2009. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government, with the Office's assistance, will send in good time all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Somalia

The Committee notes that, for the third consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that eight reports are now due. It takes due note of the statement by the Government representative to the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008), indicating that the situation of the country was still unstable and that the Government was not therefore in a position to send the reports. As soon as the national situation so permits, the Committee hopes that the Office will be in a position, as it indicated in its letter of 21 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards, to provide all the necessary assistance so that the Government can provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions in good time, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Tajikistan

The Committee notes that, following two years of interruption, the Government has once again started to send reports and has submitted 13 reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, thereby reducing the remaining number of reports due to 14, including the first report on Convention No. 182, which has been due since 2007. The Committee expresses appreciation of the efforts made by the Government, particularly as they have resulted in practical measures, and it notes that the Government benefited in this regard from the sustained support of the Office. As the Office recalled in its letter of 16 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008), the Committee emphasizes that the Government may, if necessary, once again request the Office's technical assistance for the submission of the remaining reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia

The Committee notes that nine reports on the application of ratified Conventions have been received this year. Fifty reports are still due, including first reports on Conventions Nos 182 (due since 2004) and 144 (since 2007). It takes due note of the statement by the Government representative to the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008), affirming the Government's determination to overcome the accumulated backlog in the sending of reports and its commitment to pursue continued dialogue with the Office. The latter has provided it with substantial technical assistance in recent years, including recently in May 2008 in the context of a training programme on the sending of reports. The Committee notes the Government's determination to pursue the efforts initiated the previous year to make up the backlog in the sending of reports. Noting that the number of reports due remains high, the Committee will review the situation at its next session. The Committee firmly hopes that the efforts undertaken by the Government will rapidly result in lasting solutions, so that it can send all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions in good time, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Togo

The Committee notes with regret that, for the fourth consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that 16 reports are now due. In its letter of 11 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008), the Office took the initiative of offering its technical assistance to the Government in light of the persistence of difficulties related to the sending of reports. According to the information received by the Committee, by reason of the national situation technical assistance originally planned for 2008 has had to be postponed until 2009. As soon as the national situation so permits, the Committee hopes that the Office will provide all the necessary assistance to the Government so that it can provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions in good time, in accordance with its constitutional obligations.

Turkmenistan

The Committee notes with regret that, for the tenth consecutive year, the six reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. It is particularly concerned by this situation as, on the one hand, the reports in question are all first reports due since 1999 on the application of fundamental Conventions (Nos 29, 87, 98, 100, 105 and 111) and, on the other, as it has already indicated, since the country became a Member of the Organization it has not provided any information on the application of ratified Conventions. The Committee notes that, even though the training on international standards received by the Government at its request in 2007 constituted progress, no action has been taken on it. The Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures without delay, including requesting once again the Office's technical assistance, so as to provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with the constitutional obligation incumbent upon it as a Member of the ILO.

United Kingdom

Anguilla

The Committee notes that, for the third consecutive year, the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been received and that 24 reports are now due. This non-metropolitan territory benefited from the Office's technical assistance in June–July 2008 and, according to the information provided to the Committee, should soon receive the assistance of a consultant to prepare the reports due.

British Virgin Islands

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been received and that 11 reports are now due. This non-metropolitan territory benefited from the Office's technical assistance in October 2008 when, according to information provided to the Committee, it assured the Office that some of the reports will be sent. The Committee hopes that these reports will be received soon.

Falkland Islands (Malvinas)

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been received and that nine reports are now due.

Isle of Man

The Committee notes that the majority of the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been received and that four reports are now due.

St Helena

The Committee notes the efforts made this year, following an interruption of four years, to send once again the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory, although it notes that 16 reports are still due.

The Committee notes the statement by the Government representative to the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2008) relating to the sending of reports for certain of the non-metropolitan territories referred to above. As the difficulties are due to a lack of resources, the Government is continuing to collaborate closely with the local authorities to endeavour to resolve them. As emphasized by the Office in its letter of 21 July 2008 following up the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards, the two Committees are following with heightened attention the question of the sending of reports on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories. The Office has provided technical assistance to certain of these non-metropolitan territories and is remaining in contact with them to continue providing the necessary support. Furthermore, according to the information provided to the Committee, the Government has sought information from the Office on the various options to assist the non-metropolitan territories in the preparation of reports. The Government has also provided financial support to some of these non-metropolitan territories so that they can benefit from the help of a consultant for the preparation of reports. The Committee takes due note of the efforts made this year to provide technical assistance to some non-metropolitan territories and the progress that has already been made in this respect. It hopes that these efforts will be pursued and will be extended to all the non-metropolitan territories that need such assistance so that the Government submits all reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to these non-metropolitan territories, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Freedom of association, collective bargaining, and industrial relations

General observation

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

In its recognition of the 60th anniversary of the freedom of association Convention, the Committee observes with concern that there are significant lacunae in the application of the Convention with respect to specific categories of workers. In light of the discussion in March 2008 in the Governing Body's Committee on Employment and Social Policy in relation to export processing zones (EPZs), the Committee would refer in particular to its past consideration of the application of Conventions in EPZs. In 1999, the Committee had taken note of the report of the Tripartite Meeting of Export Processing Zones–Operating Countries, which had highlighted the disparity between de jure and de facto application of labour standards in EPZs and between EPZ workers and those not working in EPZs, particularly as regards the right to organize and to bargain collectively. This information is all the more alarming in light of the estimates made in this year's report from the ILO InFocus Initiative on EPZs to the Governing Body (www.ilo.org/public/english/dialogue/sector/themes/epz.htm) that there are around 3,500 EPZs throughout the world, operating in 120 countries and territories and employing around 66 million people. The Committee further finds it of particular concern when considering the importance of fundamental human rights, in particular equality of treatment, that there is often an extremely high proportion of women among EPZ workers deprived of their rights. A perusal of the Committee's comments this year on the application of Convention No. 87 by ratifying countries lends weight to the importance of the obstacles faced by many EPZ workers and, in some cases, illustrates the dramatic impact this has had on society overall.

The Committee wishes also to raise the particular challenges faced by workers in the informal economy in relation to organizational rights. In many countries around the world, the informal economy represents between half and three-quarters of the overall workforce. The Committee, in reaffirming that Convention No. 87 is applicable to all workers and employers without distinction whatsoever, is heartened by innovative approaches taken by governments, workers' and employers' organizations over recent years to organize those in the informal economy, but observes that these are few and far between and that the full benefits of the Convention rarely reach the informal economy.

In follow up to discussions in the Governing Body in relation to EPZs and the conclusions of the 2002 Conference Committee concerning decent work and the informal economy, the Committee wishes to request governments to provide information with their next reports due on:

Export processing zones:

- the nature and extent of the workforce in any EPZs in the country (number of workers, percentage of women, percentage of migrants);
- the legislation applicable to EPZs and the manner in which the rights under the Convention are assured to EPZ workers;
- the number of trade unions in existing EPZs and the percentage of the workforce in the EPZs that is represented by unions;
- the bodies, institutions or other means available for trade unions to represent the interests of the EPZ workers they represent.

Informal economy:

- the nature and extent of the informal economy in the country, including percentage of women, percentage of migrants;
- any initiatives taken to ensure either in law or in practice the realization of the rights under the Convention to those in the informal economy.

Antigua and Barbuda

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee regrets that once again, the Government failed to reply to the specific comments and questions concerning the application of the Convention made by the Committee during several years. The Committee trusts that the Government will endeavour to be more responsive to its specific questions in its next report.

In its previous comments, the Committee had recalled the need to amend sections 19, 20, 21 and 22 of the Industrial Court Act, 1976, which permit the referral of a dispute to the court by the Minister or at the request of one party with the consequent effect of prohibiting any strike action, under penalty of imprisonment, and which permit injunctions against a legal strike when the national interest is threatened or affected, as well as the overly broad list of essential services in the Labour Code.

On the matter of essential services, the Committee notes the inclusion of the Government printing office and the port authority in the schedule of essential services in the Labour Code and considers that such services cannot be considered essential in the strict sense of the term. In this respect, the Committee would draw the Government's attention to paragraph 160 of its General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining wherein it states that, in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of all proportion to the occupational interests of the parties to the dispute, as well as damages to third parties, the authorities could establish a system of minimum service in services which are of public utility rather than impose an outright ban on strikes, which should be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term. As concerns the Minister's power to refer disputes in cases of acute national crisis, the Committee notes that the power of the Minister to refer a dispute to the court under sections 19 and 21 of the Industrial Court Act would appear to apply to situations going beyond the notion of an acute national crisis. Under section 19(1), this authority of the Minister appears to be discretionary since, under section 21, this power may be used in the national interest which would appear to be broader than the strict notion of a specific situation of acute national crisis where the restrictions imposed must be for a limited period and only to the extent necessary to meet the requirements of the situation (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 152).

In light of the above, the Committee once again urges the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that: (1) the power of the Minister to refer a dispute to binding arbitration resulting in a ban on strike action is restricted to strikes in essential services in the strict sense of the term, to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in case of an acute national crisis; (2) a binding referral of a collective dispute to the court can only be made at the request of both parties, and not any one of the parties as appears to be the case in section 19(2); and, (3) the schedule of essential services in the Labour Code is modified in order to eliminate all those services that are not essential in the strict sense of the term.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in order to amend the abovementioned legislative provisions in the very near future and reminds it that it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office.

Australia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee notes with interest the general statement made in the Government's report to the effect that the new Australian Government acknowledges that the aspects of federal workplace relations laws, previously commented on by the Committee, did not, in a number of important respects, meet the key requirements of ILO standards ratified by Australia relating to collective bargaining and freedom of association. These comments related primarily, but were not limited to, amendments made in 2005 to the Workplace Relations Act, 1996, (WR Act) by the Workplace Relations Amendment (Work Choices) Act, 2005 (Work Choices Act). The Committee also notes that: (i) a critical component of the new Government's legislative programme is to enact new laws governing workplace relations in Australia, having due regard to the issues canvassed in the report of the Committee of Experts; (ii) the first stage of the Government's legislative programme is now in place following the entry into force of the Workplace Relations Amendment (Transition to Forward with Fairness) Act, 2008 (Transition Act), on 28 March 2008; this Act amends the WR Act and provides for a measured transition to the Government's new workplace relations system which will be fully operational from 1 January 2010; (iii) the substantive workplace relations reforms under development have been the product of extensive consultation and review by employer and worker representatives and subject to extensive parliamentary scrutiny. The Committee requests the Government to communicate with its next report a copy of any draft legislation under consideration in the framework of the substantive labour law reform, so as to examine its conformity with the Convention.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right to strike. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to amend numerous provisions of the WR Act with a view to bringing them into conformity with the Convention. The Committee had referred in particular to provisions which lift the protection of industrial action in support of: multiple business agreements (section 423(1)(b)(i)); "pattern bargaining" (section 439); secondary boycotts and general sympathy strikes (section 438); negotiations over "prohibited content" (sections 356 and 436 of the WR Act, in connection with the Workplace Relations Regulations, 2006); strike pay (section 508 of the WR Act); and provisions which prohibit industrial action in case of danger to the economy (sections 430, 433 and 498 of the WR Act), through the introduction of compulsory arbitration at the initiative of the Minister (sections 500(a) and 504(3) of the WR Act). Finally, the Committee had raised the need to amend section 30J of the Crimes Act, 1914, which prohibits industrial action threatening trade or commerce with other countries or among States and section 30K of the Crimes Act, 1914, prohibiting boycotts, resulting in the obstruction or hindrance of the performance of services by the Australian Government or the transport of goods or persons in international trade.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that the substantive workplace relations reforms under development for consideration by Parliament later in 2008 will provide for protected industrial action authorized by a secret ballot during bargaining for a collective enterprise agreement; the ballot process will be fair and simple. The Committee also notes, however, that according to a communication by the Australian Congress of Trade Unions (ACTU) dated 1 September 2008, the Government has indicated its intention to retain the existing provisions which prohibit secondary boycotts and make industrial action in favour of "pattern bargaining" (i.e. negotiations seeking common wages or conditions of employment for two or more proposed collective agreements with different employers or even different subsidiaries of the same parent company) illegal. The Committee hopes that the substantive workplace relations reform will address the need to bring law and practice into conformity with the comments made by the Committee on the points raised above. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken in this regard.

Access to the workplace. In a previous direct request, the Committee had raised the need to lift the restrictive conditions set for granting a permit allowing trade union representatives to have entry to the workplace in order to meet with workers (sections 740, 742(1), (2)(b), (2)(d) and (2)(h)). The Committee notes the comments made by ACTU detailing the hurdles faced by unions in this regard and noting the intention of the new Government to retain the existing provisions.

The Committee recalls that the right of trade union officers to have access to places of work and to communicate with management is a basic activity of trade unions which should not be subject to interference by the authorities and should not be limited to communications with "eligible" employees, as trade unions should be able to apprise non-unionized workers of the potential advantages of unionization or of coverage by a collective agreement. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated to amend sections 742(1), (2)(b), (2)(d) and (2)(h) and 760 of the WR Act, so as to lift the restrictive conditions set for granting a permit giving right of entry to the workplace and ensure that the group of workers with whom a trade union representative may meet at the workplace is not artificially restricted.

Building industry. In its previous comments, the Committee, taking note of the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2326 (338th Report, paragraphs 409–457), had raised the need to rectify numerous discrepancies between the Building and Construction Industry Improvement (BCII) Act, 2005, and the Convention. The Committee had regretted, in particular, the declining rate of trade unionism in the industry which, in the Committee's view, might not be unrelated to impediments placed over collective bargaining in the BCII Act.

The Committee recalls from previous comments that: (i) the BCII Act renders virtually all forms of industrial action in the building and industrial sector unlawful; (ii) introduces severe financial penalties, injunctions and actions for uncapped damages in case of "unlawful" industrial action; (iii) gives the enforcement agency known as the Australian Building and Construction Commission (ABCC) wide-ranging coercive powers akin to an agency charged with investigating criminal matters; (iv) grants the capacity to the Minister for Workplace Relations to regulate industrial affairs in the building and construction industry by Ministerial Decree through a device referred to as a building code which is inconsistent with the Convention on several points and is implicitly "enforced" through an "accreditation scheme" for contractors who wish to enter into contracts with the Commonwealth.

The Committee notes that according to the comments made by the ACTU in its communication dated 14 September 2007, the ABCC issued a fact sheet based on the building code which implicitly discourages trade union membership and encourages resignations from trade unions; moreover, the ABCC issued a "warning" against an employer that it might suffer a reduction in opportunities to tender for Government projects or be precluded from tendering for contracts for a period of time, if it continued to allow a union delegate, rather than site management, to conduct "staff inductions". The Committee also notes that, in its comments dated 1 September 2008, the ACTU regrets that the new Government has given no indication that it is considering amending the BCII Act and that it has retained the ABCC with its powers and resources undiminished and its policy orientation unaltered. With regard to the steps taken to replace the ABCC with a "specialist regulator" as of 1 February 2010, the ACTU notes that it opposes in principle the granting of additional powers to a "specialist regulator". It adds that it considers the existence of a separate set of industrial laws for a single industry to be contrary to the principle of treating all workers equally and fairly. The ACTU raises a number of serious concerns (inter alia, by citing statistical data) about the conduct of the ABCC, the activities of which appear to continue to be targeted against trade unions and workers. The ACTU also refers to heavy financial penalties imposed by the ABCC under the BCII Act (amounting to 1.2 million Australian dollars from October 2005 to May 2008). The ACTU finally refers to the prosecution by the ABCC of a trade union officer who risks up to six months imprisonment, without being the subject of any investigation, simply for having failed to appear before the ABCC to answer questions (s. 52(6), BCII Act). The Committee also notes the comments by the ITUC in a communication dated 29 August 2008 referring to additional restrictions on trade union activities and fines imposed by the ABCC in a "campaign against workers and unions in the construction industry".

The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the ABCC will be retained until 31 January 2010, after which time, it will be replaced with a specialist building and construction division of the inspectorate of a new workplace relations agency, Fair Work Australia. The Government has engaged a former judge of the Australian Federal Court to consult and report on matters related to the creation of the specialist division and to report to the Government in 2009. A report will be provided to the Committee of Experts once the Government has had the opportunity to consider the recommendations of this inquiry.

The Committee requests the Government to provide a full reply to the information communicated by the ACTU and the ITUC in 2007 and 2008.

The Committee wishes to emphasize once again that all workers without distinction whatsoever, including workers in the building and construction industry, have the right to organise, and that the exercise of the right to organize presupposes that trade unions have the right to freely organize their activities and formulate their programmes for furthering and defending the interests of workers, without interference from the authorities. The Committee, therefore, once again urges the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated with a view to: (i) amending sections 36, 37 and 38 of the BCII Act, 2005, which refer to “unlawful industrial action” (implying not simply liability in tort vis-à-vis the employer, but a wider responsibility towards third parties and an outright prohibition of industrial action); (ii) amending sections 39, 40 and 48–50 of the BCII Act so as to eliminate any excessive impediments, penalties and sanctions against industrial action in the building and construction industry; (iii) introducing sufficient safeguards into the BCII Act so as to ensure that the functioning of the Australian Building and Construction (ABC) Commissioner and inspectors does not lead to interference in the internal affairs of trade unions – especially provisions on the possibility of lodging an appeal before the courts against the ABC Commissioner’s notices prior to the handing over of documents (sections 52, 53, 55, 56 and 59 of the BCII Act); and (iv) amending section 52(6) of the BCII Act which enables the ABC Commissioner to impose a penalty of six months’ imprisonment for failure to comply with a notice to produce documents or give information so as to ensure that penalties are proportional to the gravity of any offence. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate any measures taken to instruct the ABCC to refrain from imposing penalties or commencing legal proceedings under the ABCC while the review is under way.

The Committee addresses a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

The Committee notes with interest the general statement made in the Government’s report to the effect that the new Australian Government acknowledges that the aspects of federal workplace relations laws, previously commented on by the Committee, did not, in a number of important respects, meet the key requirements of ILO standards ratified by Australia relating to collective bargaining and freedom of association. These aspects related primarily, but were not limited to, amendments made in 2005 to the Workplace Relations Act 1996 (WR Act) by the Workplace Relations Amendment (Work Choices) Act 2005 (Work Choices Act). A critical component of the new Government’s legislative programme is to enact new laws governing workplace relations in Australia having due regard to the issues canvassed in the report of the Committee of Experts. The first stage of the Government’s legislative programme is now in place following the entry into force of the Workplace Relations Amendment (Transition to Forward with Fairness) Act 2008 (Transition Act) on 28 March 2008. The Transition Act amends the WR Act and provides for a measured transition to the Government’s new workplace relations system which will be fully operational from 1 January 2010.

The Committee notes with interest that according to the Government, key changes introduced by the Transition Act include: (i) preventing the making of further Australian Workplace Agreements (AWAs – a form of statutory individual agreement putting emphasis on direct employee–employer negotiations over collective negotiations with trade unions aimed at concluding collective agreements); since the Transition Act took effect on 28 March 2008, no new AWAs can now be made; AWAs have been used to undermine the safety net set by awards and are the least used industrial instrument in Australian workplaces, estimated by the Government at fewer than 10 per cent of Australian employees; (ii) providing for Individual Transitional Employment Agreements (ITEAs) to be available in limited circumstances during the transition period, until 31 December 2009; the aim is to provide employers and employees with time to work through their transition to the new system without major disruption or confusion; (iii) enacting a new “no disadvantage” test for all workplace agreements which provides better protection to employers’ terms and conditions of employment in relation to the provisions of the applicable collective agreement, or in the absence of a collective agreement, the applicable award and the Australian Fair Pay and Conditions Standard; in other words, ITEAs must pass a no-disadvantage test which ensures that they cannot be used to reduce the wages and conditions of employees covered by them; (iv) enabling the Australian Industrial Relations Commission to create new, modern awards.

The Committee also notes with interest that, according to the Government, collective bargaining will be placed at the centre of the new workplace relations system, which is being developed through wide consultations with union and business representatives. The current complex agreement-making process will be replaced with a simple, flexible and fair system, and the current onerous, complex and legalistic restrictions on agreement content will be removed. In the new workplace relations system, Fair Work Australia will be responsible for a range of functions including the following: (i) assisting the parties to resolve grievances; (ii) resolving unfair and unlawful dismissal claims; (iii) facilitating collective bargaining and enforcing good faith bargaining; giving bargaining parties reliable advice in order to make collective agreements and assisting employees, particularly those who are not unionized, to understand how to collectively bargain; (iv) reviewing and approving collective agreements; (v) adjusting minimum wages and award conditions; (vi) monitoring compliance with and ensuring the application of workplace laws, awards and agreements; and (vii) regulating registered industrial organizations.

The Committee also notes with interest from the Government's report that the new laws will recognise that freedom of association is vital for the proper functioning of a fair workplace relations system built on the concept of democracy in the workplace. It will be unlawful for anyone to try to stop a working person (whether by threat, pressure, discrimination, victimization or termination) from exercising their free choice to join and be represented by a union, or participate in collective activities. The Government will ensure that the new industrial arbiter, Fair Work Australia, has the power to make orders to ensure freedom of association is protected. The Committee requests the Government to communicate with its next report a copy of any draft legislation under consideration, so as to examine its conformity with the Convention.

A. Federal jurisdiction. 1. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to amend sections 659 and 693 of the WR Act so as to ensure that there is no possibility of introducing exemptions from the right to be protected against anti-union dismissal for particular classes of employees (employees "in relation to whom the operation of the provisions causes or would cause substantial problems because of: (i) their particular conditions of employment; or (ii) the size or nature of the undertaking in which they are employed"). The Government indicates that, as no regulations have been made under section 693 of the WR Act to exclude certain classes of employees from protection, all Australian employees continue to be protected against anti-union dismissal. The Committee notes, however, that the issue raised in its previous comments relates to the possibility of introducing exemptions to protection against anti-union discrimination by regulation. The Committee hopes that the substantive workplace relations reform will address the need to amend sections 659 and 693 of the WR Act so as to ensure that there is no possibility of introducing exemptions from the right to be protected against anti-union dismissal for particular classes of employees. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken in this regard.

2. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to amend section 643 of the WR Act so as to ensure that establishments with less than 100 employees are not excluded from protection against harsh, unjust or unreasonable dismissals. The Government indicates that the exemption of workplaces with less than 100 employees from unfair dismissal laws will be removed; protection against harsh, unjust or unreasonable dismissals will be restored, subject to a 12-month qualifying period for employees who work in a small business with fewer than 15 employees and six months for employees who work in large businesses. The Committee notes that dismissals on anti-union grounds (which is a narrower category in relation to harsh, unjust or unreasonable dismissals) should be available to all workers at all times and should not be subject to a qualifying period. The Committee therefore hopes that the substantive workplace relations reform will address the need to ensure that protection against anti-union discrimination is available to all workers at all times and is not subject to a qualifying period. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken in this regard.

3. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to amend sections 400(6), 793 and 400(5) of the WR Act so as to ensure that workers are adequately protected against any discrimination at the time of recruitment related to their refusal to sign an AWA. The Committee notes that the Transition Act prevents new AWAs from being made and that, until the end of 2009, sections 400(6), 793 and 400(5) of the WR Act apply in relation to ITEAs instead of AWAs. The Committee also notes with interest that, according to the Government, there will be no place for any form of statutory individual employment agreement in the new workplace relations system and thus the question of discrimination will not arise. The Committee expresses the hope that the substantive workplace relations reform will address the need to ensure that workers are adequately protected against discrimination at the time of recruitment related to their refusal to sign any form of statutory individual employment agreement. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken in this regard.

4. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to amend sections 423 and 431 of the WR Act so as to ensure that workers are adequately protected against anti-union discrimination, especially dismissals for industrial action taken in the context of negotiations of multiple business agreements and "pattern bargaining" (i.e. negotiations seeking common wages or conditions of employment for two or more proposed collective agreements with different employers or even different subsidiaries of the same parent company). The Government indicates that it is committed to continuing provisions for protected industrial action authorized by a secret ballot during bargaining for a collective agreement; it will be unlawful for an employer to dismiss an employee wholly or partly because the employee is proposing to engage, is engaging, or has engaged, in protected industrial action.

In this regard, the Committee notes the comments made by the Australian Congress of Trade Unions (ACTU) in a communication dated 1 September 2008 to the effect that the Government has indicated its intention to retain the existing provisions rendering action in favour of "pattern bargaining" illegal. The Committee once again recalls that action related to the negotiation of multiple business agreements and "pattern bargaining" is legitimate trade union activity for which adequate protection should be afforded in the law and that the choice of the bargaining level should normally be made by the parties themselves. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated to amend sections 423 and 431 of the WR Act, so as to ensure that workers are adequately protected against acts of anti-union discrimination, in particular dismissal, for acts linked to negotiating collective agreements at whatever level deemed appropriate by the parties.

5. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to establish a mechanism for the rapid and impartial examination of allegations of acts of interference in the context of the selection of a bargaining partner in the enterprise; this was considered necessary, given that under section 328(a) of the WR Act, an employer had the widest possible discretion to select a bargaining partner and to negotiate with organizations which had “at least one member” in the enterprise. Moreover, the Committee had taken note of comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2007 on the possibility for employers to bypass unions in negotiations, even when the workers wished to be represented by their union, and had raised the need for measures to ensure that “employee collective agreements” did not undermine workers’ organizations and their ability to conclude collective agreements and that, therefore, negotiations with non-unionized workers took place only where there was no representative trade union in the enterprise. Finally, the Committee had raised the need to address various provisions of the WR Act which gave preference to individual agreement-making over collective bargaining and, in particular, to amend section 348(2) of the WR Act so as to ensure that statutory individual agreements (AWAs) might prevail over collective agreements only to the extent that they were more favourable to the workers.

The Committee notes with interest that, according to the Government, since the Transition Act took effect on 28 March 2008, no new AWAs can be made, while ITEAs may be concluded in limited circumstances until 31 December 2009; moreover, a new no-disadvantage test has been put in place for all new workplace agreements, which provides better protection to employees. In addition to this, the Committee notes the Government’s commitment that under the new system, at the commencement of bargaining, employers will be obliged to inform employees of their right to be represented. Employees will be free to choose who represents them in collective bargaining. Employees who are union members will be able to be represented by a union that is eligible to represent them. All bargaining participants must respect that choice and bargain in good faith with all other bargaining participants. An independent arbiter, called “Fair Work Australia”, will be able to determine the level of support for collective bargaining amongst employees in a workplace. Where a majority of employees at a workplace want to bargain collectively, their employer will be required to bargain collectively with them in good faith.

The Committee also notes, however, that in its latest comments the ACTU regrets the fact that the Transition Act did not immediately abolish statutory individual agreements. The ACTU also draws attention to recent cases in which employers have sought to take advantage of the transitional arrangements to impose non-union collective agreements containing AWA-like conditions on their workforce so as to prevent them from being covered by collective agreements negotiated with representative unions for years to come. This is significant in light of the fact that when AWAs expire, workers will potentially be covered by these non-union agreements. The ACTU urges the Government to ensure that enforceable “agreements” cannot be made applicable to existing employees without them having participated in the decision to endorse the agreements.

Finally, the Committee notes that the Government does not make any observation as to the incident communicated by the ITUC in its previous comments concerning a call centre which had allegedly forced workers out of a collective agreement and into AWAs, and the related investigation by the Workplace Rights Advocate of the State of Victoria.

The Committee requests the Government to provide additional information on the provisions which will govern the transition from the previous system, based on statutory individual agreements (AWAs), to the new system which will have collective bargaining at its centre and to specify, in particular, the conditions under which workers covered by AWAs will be free to be represented in collective bargaining, as well as the relationship between AWAs already concluded and new collective agreements. The Committee hopes that in the framework of the substantive labour reform, measures will be taken to ensure that: (i) there is no possibility of acts of interference by the employer in the context of the selection of a bargaining partner; and that (ii) “employee collective agreements” may not be used to undermine workers’ organizations and their ability to conclude collective agreements. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken in this regard.

6. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to repeal or amend sections 151(1)(h), 152, 331(1)(a)(ii) and 332(3) of the WR Act so as to ensure that multiple business agreements are not subject to a requirement of prior authorization at the discretion of the employment advocate and that the determination of the bargaining level is left to the discretion of the parties and is not imposed by law or by decision of the administrative authority. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, under the new system Fair Work Australia will be able to facilitate multi-employer collective bargaining for low paid employees or employees who have not historically had access to the benefits of collective bargaining. Further, the Government’s policy is that where more than one employer and their employees or unions with coverage in the workplaces voluntarily agree to collectively bargain for a single agreement, they will be free to do so. Nevertheless, the Committee also notes that according to the ITUC, the Government has indicated its intention to retain the prohibition of “pattern bargaining” (i.e. negotiations seeking common wages or conditions of employment for two or more proposed collective agreements with different employers, which might therefore lead to a form of multi-employer business agreement).

The Committee once again recalls that the level of collective bargaining should be decided by the parties themselves and not be imposed by law and that legislative provisions which make the entry into force of a collective agreement subject to prior approval by the administrative authority at its discretion, is incompatible with the Convention. The Committee hopes that in the framework of the substantive labour reform under way, all types of multiple business agreements, including “pattern bargaining”, will be allowed so that the determination of the bargaining level is left to the discretion of the parties and is not imposed by law or by decision of the administrative authority. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken in this regard.

7. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to amend section 330 of the WR Act so as to ensure that the choice of bargaining agent, even in new businesses, may be made by the workers themselves so that they will not be prohibited from negotiating their terms and conditions of employment in the first year of their service for the employer even if an “employer greenfields agreement” has been registered (enabling the employer to unilaterally determine the terms and conditions of employment in a new business including any new activity by a government authority, or a body in which a government has a controlling interest, or which has been established by law for a public purpose as well as a new project which is of the same nature as the employer’s existing business activities). The Committee notes that, according to the Government, under the new system where an employer commences a genuinely new business or undertaking and they have not yet engaged any employees, the employer and a relevant union may bargain for a collective greenfields agreement for the new business. The Committee requests the Government to specify the modalities according to which an employer may negotiate with a union the terms and conditions of employment in a new business before engaging any employees and the safeguards which ensure protection against employer interference in this framework. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate whether it is still possible to conclude “employer greenfields agreements” which enable the employer to determine unilaterally the terms and conditions of employment in a new business; if that is the case, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated in the framework of the substantive labour reform, to ensure that workers in new businesses are able to choose the bargaining agent themselves, and that they are not prohibited from negotiating their terms and conditions of employment even if an “employer greenfields agreement” has been registered.

B. Building industry. In its previous comments, the Committee, taking note of the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2326 (338th Report, paragraphs 409–457), had raised the need to rectify several discrepancies between the Building and Construction Industry Improvement (BCII) Act and the Convention.

The Committee recalls that, according to the comments previously made by the ACTU, section 64 of the BCII Act prohibits project agreements, which have been a common feature of the building industry and are particularly suited to the industry’s nature as an efficient means of ensuring that all employees on a building site, who may be employed by a large number of small subcontractors, are covered by one agreement setting standard wages and conditions.

The Committee notes that the Government has commenced a process of extensive consultation in relation to the BCII Act and the regulatory arrangements that will apply after 31 January 2010. The Government’s policy is that collective bargaining will be based at the enterprise level using a well understood definition of “enterprise” which may include a single business or employer, a group of related businesses operating as a single business or a discrete undertaking, site or project. However, pattern bargaining and industry-wide bargaining will not be permitted. The new system contemplates multi-employer bargaining in the circumstances delineated above.

Taking note of the extensive comments made by the ACTU on this issue, under the Committee’s comments concerning Convention No. 87, and also noting that, according to the Government, under the new workplace relations system there will be no place for any form of statutory individual agreements, which means that certain provisions of the BCII operating in conjunction with the WR Act may be substantially modified in the future, the Committee regrets that the Government has not provided more detailed information on the specific steps contemplated to bring the BCII into full conformity with the Convention.

The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to bring the BCII Act into conformity with the Convention with regard to the following points: (i) the revision of section 64 of the Act so as to ensure that the determination of the bargaining level is left to the discretion of the parties and is not imposed by law or by decision of the administrative authority; (ii) the promotion of collective bargaining, especially by ensuring that there are no financial penalties or incentives linked to undue restrictions on collective bargaining (sections 27 and 28 of the Act authorize the Minister to deny Commonwealth funding to contractors bound by a collective agreement that, although lawful, does not meet the requirements of the building code; the latter: (i) excludes a wide range of matters from the scope of collective bargaining; and (ii) contains financial incentives to ensure that statutory individual agreements may override collective agreements).

C. Higher education sector. In its previous comments the Committee raised the need to amend section 33-5 of the Higher Education Support Act 2003, as well as the Higher Education Workplace Relations Requirements (HEWRRs) which raised obstacles to collective bargaining similar to those raised by the WR Act and the BCII Act, by: (1) providing economic incentives to ensure that collective agreements contain exceptions in favour of AWAs; and (2) allowing for negotiations with non-unionized workers even where representative trade unions exist in the unit. The Committee notes with interest that the Government has introduced into the Australian Parliament draft legislation to abolish the HEWRRs. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report progress made in the adoption of legislation aimed at abolishing the HEWRRs.

A request on another point is being addressed directly to the Government.

Bangladesh

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received and takes note of the discussion that took place at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2008.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it took note of an extensive list of serious violations of workers' basic civil liberties which, according to the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), had been committed in 2006 in the context of a strike and a riot in the garment sector and a reported harsh crackdown by the army's rapid action battalion; the ITUC had also referred to the death of a striking worker, numerous arrests of trade union leaders, the raiding of trade union offices and police harassment.

The Committee takes note of the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 29 August 2008, with regard to alleged violations committed in 2007 including the arrest and detention of the General Secretary of Dhaka University Teachers' Association (DUTA) and intimidation of unions by the military and security forces, the Government and employers. The Committee also notes that despite a tripartite agreement signed on 12 June 2006 to withdraw cases lodged against the workers in 2006 and release the arrested persons in Gazipur, Tongi, Savar and Ashulia Police Stations, Cases Nos 49/06, 50/06 and 51/06 against workers which are under the jurisdiction of the Joydevpur Police Station are yet to be withdrawn.

The Committee notes from the statement of the Government representative to the Conference Committee that all those arrested had been released on bail and the Government was not actively pursuing their cases. There were over 5,000 factories in the country with 2.5 million workers and it was not easy to maintain law and order in all of the factories. The Government was committed to ensuring law and order in factories with the utmost restraint.

The Committee regrets that the Government has not provided full particulars in respect of all the allegations of arrest, harassment and detention of trade unionists and trade union leaders as requested by the Conference Committee. Recalling that freedom of association can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of workers' organizations and that detention of trade unionists for reasons connected with their activities in defence of the interests of workers, constitutes a serious interference with civil liberties in general and with trade union rights in particular, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide full particulars in respect of all the allegations of arrest, harassment and detention of trade unionists and trade union leaders.

Furthermore, the Committee reiterates its previous requests for information on: (i) measures taken, including instructions given to the law enforcement authorities, so as to avoid the danger of excessive violence in trying to control demonstrations, and ensure that arrests are made only where criminal acts have been committed; (ii) the charges brought in 2004 against 350 women trade unionists, including the General Secretary of the JSL's Women's Committee, Shamsur Nahar Bhuiyan and all judicial decisions taken in this matter; and (iii) the measures taken to ensure the prompt registration of Immaculate (Pvt) Ltd Sramik Union.

The Committee notes that according to the latest communication by the ITUC, throughout 2007 the Joint Director for Labour (JDL) who is responsible for registering new trade unions refused to take any actions on pending union registration applications, particularly in the textiles sector, thereby effectively denying workers their right to association and bargain collectively; the ITUC also refers to processes initiated to deregister the Bangladesh Garments and Industrial Sramik Federation (BGIWF) and threats to deregister two other federations which cooperated with the petition of the AFL-CIO lodged before the Office of the US Trade Representative seeking the revocation of Generalized System of Preferences (GSP) privileges for Bangladesh. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this regard and to indicate the number of trade unions registered in 2007, particularly in the textile sector, as well as the current status of the BGIWF.

The Committee also recalls that its previous comments concerned the following issues.

Right to organize in export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee notes that according to the previous comments made by the ITUC, the Bangladesh Export Processing Zones Authority (BEPZA) continued to raise obstacles to the establishment of workers' associations in EPZs after the deadline of 31 October 2006 set in section 13(1) of the Industrial Relations Act 2004; although after this deadline, workers had the right to apply to form workers' associations the BEPZA allegedly failed to devise and provide the prescribed form needed by the workers to this effect, thus preventing in practice the establishment of such associations; the ITUC adds in its latest communication that following the filing of the AFL-CIO petition on the revocation of GSP privileges, delaying tactics at BEPZA relented and workers were provided the opportunity to register their intent to form workers' associations and participate in elections to formally establish them; in the final months of 2007, many workers' associations went through the election process, frequently with over 90 per cent of the workers in favour; nevertheless, employers continued to refuse to substantively accept their role or to enter into negotiations with them. The Committee requests the Government to communicate its observations in this regard and to provide statistical information on the number of workers' associations established in the EPZs after 1 November 2006.

The Committee further recalls that the EPZ workers' associations and Industrial Relations Act 2004, contains numerous and significant restrictions and delays in relation to the right to organize in EPZs and, in particular:

- (i) provides that workers' associations will not be allowed in industrial units established after the commencement of the Act, until a period of three months has expired after the commencement of commercial production in the concerned unit (section 24);
- (ii) provides that there can be no more than one workers' association per industrial unit (section 25(1));
- (iii) establishes excessive and complicated minimum membership and referendum requirements for the establishment of workers' associations (a workers' association may be formed only when a minimum of 30 per cent of the eligible workers of an industrial unit seek its formation, and this has been verified by the Executive Chairperson of BEPZA, who shall then conduct a referendum on the basis of which the workers shall acquire the legitimate right to form an association under the Act, only if more than 50 per cent of the eligible workers cast their vote, and more than 50 per cent of the votes cast are in favour of the formation of the workers' association (sections 14, 15, 17 and 20);
- (iv) confers excessive powers of approval of the constitution drafting committee to the Executive Chairperson of the BEPZA (section 17(2));
- (v) prevents steps for the establishment of a workers' association in the workplace for a period of one year after a first attempt failed to gather sufficient support in a referendum (section 16);
- (vi) permits the deregistration of a workers' association at the request of 30 per cent of the workers even if they are not members of the association and prevents the establishment of another trade union for one year after the previous trade union was deregistered (section 35);
- (vii) provides for the cancellation of the registration of a workers' association on grounds which do not appear to justify the severity of this sanction (such as contravention of any of the provisions of the association's constitution) (sections 36(1)(c), (e)–(h) and 42(1)(a));
- (viii) establishes a total prohibition of industrial action in EPZs until 31 October 2008 (section 88(1) and (2)); provides for severe restrictions of strike action, once recognized (possibility to prohibit a strike if it continues for more than 15 days or even before this deadline, if the strike is considered as causing serious harm to productivity in the EPZ (section 54(3) and (4));
- (ix) prevents workers' associations from obtaining or receiving any fund from any outside source without the prior approval of the Executive Chairperson of the BEPZA (section 18(2));
- (x) establishes an excessively high minimum number of trade unions to establish a higher level organization (more than 50 per cent of the workers' associations in an EPZ (section 32(1));
- (xi) prohibits a federation from affiliating in any manner with federations in other EPZs and beyond EPZs (section 32(3)); and
- (xii) does not seem to afford guarantees against interference with the right of workers to elect their representatives in full freedom (e.g. the procedure of election shall be determined by the BEPZA, etc. (sections 5(6) and (7), 28(1), 29 and 32(4)).

The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the EPZ workers' associations and Industrial Relations Act so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention and to provide detailed information in its next report in this respect.

Other discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. The Committee recalls that for many years it had been referring to serious discrepancies between the national legislation and the Convention. It now notes the adoption of the Bangladesh Labour Act 2006 (the Labour Act) which replaced the Industrial Relations Ordinance 1969 (section 353(1)(x)).

The Committee notes with deep regret that the new Act does not contain any improvements in relation to the previous legislation and in certain regards contains even further restrictions which run against the provisions of the Convention. Thus, the Committee notes the following:

- the need to repeal provisions on the exclusion of managerial and administrative employees from the right to establish workers' organizations (section 2 XLIX and LXV of the Labour Act) as well as new restrictions of the right to organize of fire-fighting staff, telex operators, fax operators and cipher assistants (exclusion from the provisions of the Act based on section 175 of the Labour Act);
- the need to either amend section 1(4) of the Labour Act or adopt new legislation so as to ensure that the workers in the following sectors, which have been excluded from the scope of application of the Act including its provisions on freedom of association, have the right to organize: offices of or under the Government (except workers in the Railway Department, Posts, Telegraph and Telephone Departments, Roads and Highways Department, Public Works Department and Public Health Engineering Department and the Bangladesh Government Press); the security printing press; establishments for the treatment or care of the sick, infirm, aged, destitute, mentally disabled, orphans, abandoned children, widows or deserted women, which are not run for profit or gains; shops or stalls in public exhibitions which deal in retail trade; shops in any public fair for religious or charitable purposes;

educational, training and research institutions; agricultural farms with less than ten workers; domestic servants; and establishments run by the owner with the aid of members of the family. In case any of the above sectors are already covered by existing legislation, the Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect,

- the need to repeal provisions which restrict membership in trade unions and participation in trade union elections to those workers who are currently employed in an establishment or group of establishments, including seafarers currently engaged in merchant shipping (section 2 LXV and 175, 185(2) of the Labour Act);
- the need to repeal or amend new provisions which define as an unfair labour practice on the part of a worker or trade union, an act aimed at “intimidating” any person to become, continue to be or cease to be a trade union member or officer, or “inducing” any person to cease to be a member or officer of a trade union by conferring or offering to confer any advantage and the consequent penalty of imprisonment for such acts (sections 196(2)(a) and (b) and 291 of the Labour Act); the Committee considers that the terms “intimidating” or “inducing” are too general and do not sufficiently safeguard against interference in internal trade union affairs, since, for instance, a common activity of trade unions is to recruit members by offering advantages, including with regard to other trade unions;
- the need to repeal provisions which prevent workers from running for trade union office if they were previously convicted for compelling or attempting to compel the employer to sign a memorandum of settlement or to agree to any demand by using intimidation, pressure, threats, etc. (sections 196(2)(d) and 180(1)(a) of the Labour Act);
- the need to lower the minimum membership requirement of 30 per cent of the total number of workers employed in an establishment or group of establishments for initial and continued union registration, as well as the possibility of deregistration if the membership falls below this number (sections 179(2) and 190(f) of the Labour Act); the need to repeal provisions which provide that no more than three trade unions shall be registered in any establishment or group of establishments (section 179(5) of the Labour Act) and that only one trade union of seafarers shall be registered (section 185(3) of the Labour Act); finally, the need to repeal provisions prohibiting workers from joining more than one trade union and the consequent penalty of imprisonment in case of violation of this prohibition (sections 193 and 300 of the Labour Act);
- the need to repeal provisions denying the right of unregistered unions to collect funds (section 192 of the Labour Act) upon penalty of imprisonment (section 299 of the Labour Act);
- the need to lift several restrictions on the right to strike: requirement for three-quarters of the members of a workers’ organization to consent to a strike (sections 211(1) and 227(c) of the Labour Act); possibility of prohibiting strikes which last more than 30 days (sections 211(3) and 227(c) of the Labour Act); possibility of prohibiting strikes at any time if a strike is considered prejudicial to the national interest (sections 211(3) and 227(c) of the Labour Act) or involves a public utility service including the generation, production, manufacture, or supply of gas and oil to the public, as well as railways, airways, road and river transport, ports and banking (sections 211(4) and 227(c) of the Labour Act); prohibition of strikes for a period of three years from the date of commencement of production in a new establishment, or an establishment owned by foreigners or established in collaboration with foreigners (sections 211(8) and 227(c) of the Labour Act); penalties of imprisonment for participation in – or instigation to take part in unlawful industrial action or go-slow (sections 196(2)(e) and 291, 294–296 of the Labour Act);
- the need to repeal provisions which provide that no person refusing to take part in an illegal strike shall be subject to expulsion or any other disciplinary measure by the trade union, so as to leave this matter to be determined in accordance with trade union rules (section 229 of the Labour Act);
- the need to amend new provisions which define as an unfair labour practice on the part of workers, an act of compelling or attempting to compel the employer to sign a memorandum of settlement or to accept or agree to any demand by using “intimidation”, “pressure”, “threat” so as to ensure that there is no interference with the right of trade unions to engage in activities like collective bargaining or strikes, and to repeal the consequent penalty of imprisonment for such acts (sections 196(d) and 291(2) of the Labour Act);
- the need to amend provisions which impose a penalty of imprisonment for failure to appear before the conciliator in the framework of settlement of industrial disputes (section 301 of the Labour Act).

The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to bring the Labour Act 2006 into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee also notes that it is not clear from the provisions of the Labour Act whether rule 10 of the Industrial Relations Rules 1977 (IRO) which previously granted the Registrar of Trade Unions overly broad authority to enter trade union offices, inspect documents, etc., without judicial review, has been repealed. It would appear from section 353(2)(a) that the rule remains in force, as the section in question provides that any rule under any provision of the repealed laws (including the IRO) shall have effect until altered, amended, rescinded or repealed, so far as it is not inconsistent with the provisions of the Labour Act 2006. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report whether rule 10 of the IRO has been repealed by the entry into force of the Labour Act 2006 and, if not, to indicate the measures taken or contemplated with a view to its repeal or amendment.

Barbados

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee takes note of the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 29 August 2008 as well as the comments submitted by the Congress of Trade Union and Staff Associations of Barbados indicating that legislation commented upon by the Committee remains in place.

The Committee recalls that for numerous years it has advised the Government to amend section 4 of the Better Security Act 1920, according to which any person who wilfully breaks a contract of service or hiring, knowing that this could endanger real or personal property, is liable to a fine or up to three months' imprisonment, so as to eliminate the possibility of employers invoking it in a case of future strikes. The Committee notes the statement in the Government's report that section 4 of the Better Security Act 1920, has not been invoked in the case of a strike. The Committee recalls that if this provision is applicable in the case of a strike, it should be amended so that such penalties may only be imposed with respect to essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal health or safety of the whole or part of the population, and that the sanctions should not be disproportionate to the seriousness of the violations. Once again, the Committee strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend the Act in the very near future to bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken in this regard.

Furthermore, the Committee has been requesting the Government since 1998 to provide information on developments in the process of reviewing legislation regarding trade union recognition, to which the Government had referred. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that no further action has been taken. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report if the drafting legislation process concerning trade union recognition could be considered as abandoned.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. The Committee further notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 29 August 2008, concerning anti-union interference and strategies for avoiding collective bargaining in an enterprise of the telecommunication sector, as well as the comments submitted by the Congress of Trade Union and Staff Associations of Barbados concerning issues already raised by the Committee. It requests the Government to provide its observations concerning the ITUC's comments.

Article 1 of the Convention. Lack of protection against anti-union discrimination. The Committee recalls that, in its previous observations, it had indicated that Article 1 of the Convention guarantees workers adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, in taking up employment and throughout the course of employment, including at the time of termination and covers all measures of anti-union discrimination (dismissals, demotions, transfers and other prejudicial acts) and that legislation prohibiting acts of discrimination is inadequate if not coupled with effective, expeditious procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions to ensure their application (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 223 and 224). In this connection, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that its legislation provides adequate protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination, as well as adequate and dissuasive sanctions.

Finally, the Committee points out to the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the Office in solving this serious problem.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Belarus

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the measures taken to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association (352nd Report, approved by the Governing Body at its 303rd Session) and the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2008. The Committee also takes note of the seminar on anti-union discrimination which was held in Belarus in June 2008, with participation of ILO representatives and tripartite constituents. The Committee further notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention in law and in practice in a communication dated 29 August 2008.

The Committee recalls that all of the issues raised in its outstanding comments are directly related to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it had previously noted with regret that no progress had been made in respect of the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry to register the primary-level organizations that were the subject of the complaint. It further noted with regret that two trade unions affiliated to the Radio and Electronic Workers' Union (REWU), which submitted applications for registration in 2006–07 were not registered (primary trade union of “Avtopark No. 1” and Mogilev city primary trade union). The Committee further noted that the non-registration of primary trade union organizations had led to the denial of registration of three regional organizations of the Belarusian Free Trade Union (BFTU) (organizations in Mogilev, Baranovichi and Novopolotsk-Polotsk). The Committee had therefore expressed the firm hope that the Government would take all necessary measures for the immediate re-registration of these organizations both at the primary and the regional level so that these workers may exercise their right to form and join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. It further requested the Government to keep it informed of the number of organizations registered and those denied registration. The Committee deeply regrets that no information was provided by the Government on steps taken to ensure the immediate registration of the primary-level organizations that were the subject of the complaint examined by the Commission of Inquiry. The Committee further regrets to note that, apart from the Novopolotsk-Polotsk organization, which according to the Government has been registered since 2000, no other trade union, the registration of which had been requested by the ILO supervisory bodies, has been registered. The Committee further notes from the 352nd Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association the new allegations of denial of registration of the REWU organizations in Gomel, Smolevichi and Rechitsa and of the Belarusian trade union of individual entrepreneurs “Razam”, a partner organization of the Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (CDTU). Regretting the absence of action by the Government on these matters, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all of the non-registered trade union organizations are registered without delay and requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect. It further once again requests the Government to indicate the number of organizations registered and those denied registration during the reporting year.

The Committee notes that the main obstacle to registration of the BFTU and the REWU organizations mentioned above is the absence of legal address. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that with the adoption of the new Law on Trade Unions, the provisions of Presidential Decree No. 2 of 1999, which impose the legal address requirement for registration of trade union organizations, would cease to have effect. With regard to the process of drafting of the new Law on Trade Unions, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government that it was decided to hold back the draft Law and that new legislation would be developed in consultation with the social partners concerned. The Committee regrets to note that in the meantime, the legal address requirement continues to hinder the establishment and functioning of trade unions despite the recommendation of the Commission of Inquiry to amend the relevant provisions of the Decree, its rules and regulations so as to eliminate any obstacles that might be caused by this requirement. In light of the fact that the requirement of legal address, as provided for in Decree No. 2, continues to raise difficulties with the registration of trade unions, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to immediately amend the Decree to eliminate this requirement so as to ensure that workers and employers may form organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. The Committee further expects that any new legislation relating to trade union registration will be in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this respect.

Article 3. The Committee once again notes with regret that no information has been provided in respect of the steps taken to amend the Law on Mass Activities and sections 388, 390, 392 and 399 of the Labour Code, and to ensure that National Bank employees may have recourse to industrial action, without penalty. The Committee must therefore once again recall that it has been asking the Government to amend these provisions for several years now. Recalling that the abovementioned legislative provisions are not in conformity with the right of workers to organize their activities and programmes free from interference by the public authorities, the Committee reiterates its previous requests and asks the Government to indicate the measures taken in this respect. The Committee further expresses its concern at the allegations in the ITUC communication of repeated refusals to authorize the Belarusian Independent Trade Union (BITU) and the REWU to hold pickets and meetings. The Committee recalls that protests are protected by the principles of freedom of association and that permission to hold public meetings and demonstrations, which is an important trade union right, should not be arbitrarily refused. The Committee requests the Government to conduct independent investigations into the alleged cases of refusals to hold pickets and meetings and to bring the attention of the relevant authorities to the right of workers to participate in peaceful demonstrations to defend their occupational interests and to indicate any developments in this respect.

Articles 3, 5 and 6. The Committee once again regrets that no information has been supplied by the Government in respect of the measures taken to amend section 388 of the Labour Code, which prohibits strikers from receiving financial assistance from foreign persons, and Decree No. 24 concerning the use of foreign gratuitous aid, so that workers' and employers' organizations may effectively organize their administration and activities and benefit from assistance from international organizations of workers and employers. The Committee must therefore reiterate that restrictions on the use of foreign aid for legitimate trade union activities is contrary to the right of national workers' and employers' organizations to receive financial assistance from international workers' and employers' organizations in pursuit of these aims. Regretting the absence of measures by the Government on the matters above, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend both Decree No. 24 and section 388 of the Labour Code so that workers' organizations are not prohibited from using foreign aid to support industrial action or any other legitimate activity.

The Committee observes, just like the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards at its last discussion in June 2008, that while some positive steps have been taken by the Government, the current situation in Belarus still remains far from ensuring full respect for freedom of association and the application of the provisions of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it will continue its cooperation with the ILO and to that effect, a tripartite seminar (with the participation of representatives from the Government, trade unions – those affiliated and not affiliated to the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus – employers' organizations, the ILO, the ITUC and the International Organisation of Employers) on the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry is under preparation. The Committee welcomes this initiative and expresses the firm hope that concrete and tangible steps will be taken in the near future so as to ensure the full implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry without delay.

The Committee requests the Government to respond to the observations made by the ITUC.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 98th Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2009.]

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the measures taken to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association (352nd Report, approved by the Governing Body at its 303rd Session) and the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2008. The Committee also takes note of the seminar on anti-union discrimination which was held in Belarus in June 2008, with the participation of ILO representatives and tripartite constituents. The Committee further notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention in law and in practice in a communication dated 29 August 2008.

The Committee recalls that all of its outstanding comments have raised issues directly relating to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to review and redress all complaints of anti-union discrimination that had been raised in the complaint filed under article 26 of the ILO Constitution or had come to light in the examination of the follow-up given by the Government to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The Committee had also requested the Government to ensure an independent investigation into the alleged instances of interference and anti-union discrimination at the "Mogilev ZIV" and "Avtopark No. 1" suffered by the primary trade union affiliated to the Radio and Electronic Workers' Union (REWU) and its members and to ensure that the rights of workers who had suffered anti-union discrimination in these enterprises were fully redressed. It had further asked the Government to indicate whether the officials of the Belarusian Free Trade Union (BFTU) were allowed access to the enterprise to meet their members and to provide information on the outcome of the discussion at the level of the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in Social and Labour Spheres of the case concerning the "Belshina" enterprise. Finally, it had urged the Government to rapidly adopt new, improved mechanisms and procedures to ensure effective protection against all types of anti-union discrimination and to indicate the progress made in this regard.

The Committee regrets that the information provided by the Government is once again limited to the indication that the current legal framework provides for adequate measures to protect citizens from acts of anti-union discrimination, that enterprise labour commissions can examine disputes involving allegations of anti-union discrimination and that aggrieved workers can have recourse to the courts according to the procedures provided for in the Code of Civil Procedure. According to the Government, in 2007, no cases involving allegations of anti-union discrimination were lodged with the courts. The Committee notes the Government's indication concerning the seminar on anti-union discrimination organized in June 2008 with the participation of representatives of employers' organizations, trade unions, including those not affiliated to the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus, representatives of the Ministry of Justice and the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection, judges and prosecutors, representatives of the ILO, the ITUC and of the International Organisation of Employers. The Government further states that it will continue its cooperation with the ILO and to that effect, another tripartite seminar on the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry is under preparation.

The Committee notes with regret the new ITUC comments on of anti-union discrimination against members of the Belarusian Independent Trade Union (BITU) at "Polymir" company and the leaders of the BFTU at the Brest State Pedagogical University and the allegation of denial of access to workplace ("Belaruskaliy") to the leader of the BITU, as well as a number of comments of interference, anti-union pressure and anti-union dismissals submitted by the BITU and the REWU to the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Committee recalls that it had previously noted the Government's statement that the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Spheres reviewed complaints concerning specific enterprises. The Committee notes, however, from the recent report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, that the Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (CDTU) considers that this Council fails to play an effective role in eliminating violations of trade union rights.

In the light of the above, the Committee considers that the measures taken so far by the Government to ensure the full application of Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention are insufficient. In these circumstances, the Committee once again urges the Government to pursue vigorously, on the one hand, the instructions to be given to enterprises so as to ensure that enterprise managers do not interfere in the internal affairs of trade unions and, on the other, instructions to the Prosecutor-General, Minister of Justice and court administrators that all complaints of interference and anti-union discrimination are thoroughly investigated.

The Committee further requests the Government to provide its observations on the comments submitted by the ITUC and to carry out independent investigations into all alleged instances of interference and anti-union discrimination and to keep it informed in this respect. It further reiterates its request to immediately redress the damages suffered from anti-union discrimination by those workers mentioned in the complaint filed under article 26 of the ILO Constitution, as well as those cases that had come to light in the examination of the follow-up given by the Government to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the developments in this respect.

Belize

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes, with regret, that for the fourth consecutive year, the Government's report has not been received.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee takes note of the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008, to the effect that the procedures before the courts in cases of anti-union discrimination are too slow and cumbersome while the fines imposed are extremely low. According to the ITUC, cases of anti-union discrimination occur in practice in the banana plantation sector and in export processing zones, where employers do not recognize any unions. The ITUC also refers to instances of anti-union discrimination in specific companies. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on this subject.

Articles 3 and 4. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that, under the provisions of section 27(2) of the Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations (Registration, Recognition and Status) Act, Chapter 304, a trade union could be certified as a bargaining agent if it received 51 per cent of the votes and that problems might arise from such a requirement of an absolute majority since, where this percentage was not attained, the majority union would be denied the possibility of bargaining. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to report on any measures taken or contemplated to amend the legislation so as to ensure that when no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights are not denied to the unions in this unit, at least on behalf of their own members.

The Committee notes that according to the ITUC, collective bargaining rights are frequently violated by employers, despite the fact that they are guaranteed in law. The Committee requests the Government to reply to these comments and to provide statistical information in its next report on the number of collective agreements concluded during the last two years, as well as the sectors and number of workers covered by such agreements.

Bolivia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 29 August 2008, which refer to legislative matters already raised by the Committee as well as death threats against the Executive Secretary of the Bolivian Central of Workers (COB) and a dynamite attack against the COB headquarters in La Paz. In this regard, the Committee recalls that in such cases, the setting up of an independent judicial inquiry is a particularly appropriate method of fully ascertaining the facts, determining responsibilities, punishing those responsible and preventing the repetition of such actions. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in this regard.

The Committee observes with concern that for many years, its comments have referred to the following matters.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations of their own choosing. Exclusion of agricultural workers from the scope of the General Labour Act of 1942 and hence from the guarantees afforded by the Convention (section 1 of the General Labour Act of 1942 and Regulatory Decree No. 224 of 23 August 1943 issued under the Act). The Committee notes that in its report, the Government points out that legislative progress in favour of agricultural workers is gradual. Thus, the Act of 22 November 1945 recognizes some rights of rubber workers; several supreme resolutions of 1971 recognize rights of these workers and of chestnut workers; Supreme Decrees Nos 19524 of 1983 and 20255 of 1984 recognize a special scheme in favour of sugar cane and cotton harvest workers, whose right to organize is expressly recognized; final provision No. 4 of Act No. 1715 of the National Agrarian Reform Service provides for wage-earning agricultural workers to be included in the scope of the General Labour Act, under a special seasonal scheme which reflects the seasonal nature of the work they perform. Section 3 of Act No. 3785 of 23 November 2007 also provides that seasonal workers are included in the scope of the General Labour Act. Thus, according to the Government, agricultural workers have gradually been included in the scope of this Act. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures so that all agricultural workers, whether they are wage earners or self-employed workers, enjoy the guarantees of the Convention.

Denial of the right to organize of public servants (section 104 of the General Labour Act). The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the Civil Service Superintendence, which is an autonomous body under the Ministry of Labour, is examining the possibility of recognizing the right of association of the public sector. The Committee recalls that under Article 2, public servants, like all workers without distinction whatsoever, should enjoy the right to establish organizations of their own choosing and join those organizations without previous authorization for the promotion and defence of their interests. In this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that public servants enjoy the guarantees envisaged in the Convention.

Requirement that 50 per cent of the workers in an enterprise must give their agreement in order to establish a trade union if the latter is industrial (section 103 of the General Labour Act). The Committee notes that the Government points out that the percentage in question is not always restrictive because the political Constitution guarantees free unionization as a means of defence, representation, assistance, education and culture of workers. In this regard, the Committee reiterates once again that the percentage concerned is very high and could therefore hinder the establishment of trade unions at the industry level. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to take the necessary measures to lower the percentage concerned to a reasonable level.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their administration and activities, elect their representatives in full freedom and formulate their programmes, without interference from the public authorities. Broad powers of supervision conferred on the labour inspectorate over trade union activities (section 101 of the General Labour Act provides that labour inspectors shall attend the debates of trade unions and monitor their activities). The Committee notes that according to the Government, labour inspectors check the activities of trade union organizations to ensure that they are acting in accordance with the legislation, ensuring observance of the principle of legality. The aim of such inspections is to prevent confrontations between groups of workers in the same organization. The inspections are carried out in moderation, in an impartial manner and with respect for the democratic decisions and the principle of legitimacy of the workers elected to a board. In this regard, the Committee recalls once again that Article 3 provides that workers' organizations shall enjoy the right to organize their administration and the public authorities shall refrain from any interference which would restrict this right. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 101 of the General Labour Act so that any external interference is limited to exceptional cases where it is justified by serious circumstances.

Requirement that trade union officers must be Bolivian (section 138 of the Regulatory Decree of the General Labour Act) and permanent employees in the enterprise (sections 6(c) and 7 of Legislative Decree No. 2565 of June 1951). The Committee notes that the Government refers to the right of foreigners to obtain Bolivian nationality when they have resided in the country for at least two years or for a shorter period in certain cases. It points out that the requirement that trade union leaders must be Bolivian is a way of protecting the rights of national workers given that there is a risk that a foreign worker with less than one year's residence might leave the country, abandoning the workers and the trade union. In this regard, the Committee recalls that provisions on nationality which are too strict could deprive some workers of the right to elect their representatives in full freedom, for example migrant workers in sectors in which they account for a significant share of the workforce. The Committee considers that national legislation should allow foreign workers to take up trade union office, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the host country (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 118), regardless of the acquisition of nationality.

The Committee also recalls that provisions which lay down the requirement to belong to an occupation or establishment in order to be a trade union officer are not consistent with the Convention. Provisions of this type infringe the organization's right to elect representatives in full freedom by preventing qualified persons, such as full-time union officers or pensioners, from carrying out union duties or by depriving unions of the benefit of the experience of certain officers when they are unable to provide enough qualified persons from among their own ranks (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 117).

The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to lift these restrictions in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention.

Right to strike. Majority of three-quarters of the workers in order to call a strike (section 114 of the General Labour Act and section 159 of the Regulatory Decree). The Committee notes that according to the Government, the figure in question is a balanced one which encourages and allows consensus between workers, preventing minority decisions by a few to the detriment of the majority of workers who hold another view. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the requirement of a decision by over half of all the workers involved in order to declare a strike is excessive and could excessively hinder the possibility of carrying out a strike, particularly in large enterprises. The Committee considers, for example, that it would be more appropriate to reduce the majority laid down to a simple majority of the votes cast. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation in order to lower the majorities required to call a strike.

Illegality of general and sympathy strikes, subject to penal sanctions (sections 1 and 2 of Legislative Decree No. 2565 and 234 of the Penal Code). The Committee notes that the Government points out that, according to the National Directorate of Prisons, there is no record of persons having been detained as a preventive measure or convicted on these grounds during the period 2005–07, and that the Government, with the support of the ILO, intends to implement the tripartite agreement reached between the COB, the Bolivian Confederation of Private Entrepreneurs and the Ministry of Labour of Bolivia, designed to amend sections 2, 9 and 10 of Legislative Decree No. 2565 and section 234 of the Penal Code. The Committee recalls that the general prohibition of sympathy strikes could lead to abuse, especially when the initial strike is legal, and that these strikes, as well as general strikes, are means of action which should be available to workers. The Committee also recalls that no worker on strike who has acted peacefully should be subject to criminal sanctions. The Committee expresses the hope that in the near future the necessary amendments will be made to Legislative Decree No. 2565 and to the Penal Code in accordance with the above principles.

Illegality of strikes in the banking sector (section 1(c) of Supreme Decree No. 1958 of 1950). The Committee notes that the Government points out that the Decree in question determines the public services, the activities of which shall not be interrupted so as not to harm society, including banking activities, the services of which may not be withdrawn given that these services involve the handling of the subsistence resources of many people. In this regard, the Committee recalls that banking services are not regarded as essential services in the strict sense of the term (services the interruption of which could endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population) in which strikes may be banned or restricted. However, the Committee recalls the possibility of a negotiated minimum service in cases where, although the total prohibition of strike action is not justified, and without calling into question the right to strike of the large majority of workers, it is considered necessary to ensure that users' basic needs are met. The Committee requests the Government to amend Supreme Decree No. 1958 of 1950 in order to ensure that the banking sector enjoys the right to strike in accordance with the above principles.

Possibility of imposing compulsory arbitration by decision of the Executive in order to bring an end to a strike, including in services other than those that are essential in the strict sense of the term (section 113 of the General Labour Act). The Committee observes that the Government refers to the arbitration procedure and to the tripartite composition of the arbitration tribunals as a means of resolving disputes and conflicts, and points out that compulsory arbitration is not imposed by the Executive and that it is used to prevent strike action and not to bring a strike to an end. In this regard, the Committee recalls that a system of compulsory arbitration through the labour authorities, if a dispute is not settled by other means, can result in a considerable restriction of the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and may even involve an absolute prohibition of strikes, contrary to the principles of freedom of association. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute and a strike is acceptable if it is at the request of both parties involved in a dispute, or if the strike in question may be restricted, even banned, i.e. in the case of disputes in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to amend section 113 of the General Labour Act in accordance with the above principles.

Article 4. Dissolution of trade unions. Possibility of dissolving trade union organizations by administrative authority (section 129 of the Regulatory Decree). The Committee notes that the Government points out that the Regulatory Decree issued under the General Labour Act refers to two grounds for the dissolution of trade union organizations: (1) the violation of the General Labour Act, and (2) in the event of a suspension of activities for one year. In the latter case, the aim is to encourage workers not to neglect to establish their board and obtain the appropriate recognition of the Ministry of Labour. The Government points out that the Ministry of Labour has not recorded many cases of dissolution of trade unions on the above grounds. It points out that dissolution takes place more frequently at the request of workers, with the agreement of the workers to determine the distribution of the trade union's assets. The Committee recalls that measures of suspension or dissolution by the administrative authority constitute serious infringements of the principles of freedom of association. The Committee considers that the dissolution of trade union organizations is a measure which should only occur in extremely serious cases; such dissolutions should only happen following a judicial decision so that the rights of defence are fully guaranteed. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to amend the legislation in accordance with the above principle.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate any legislative developments relating to all the questions raised.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 29 August 2008, which refer to matters already raised by the Committee, as well as anti-union dismissals in a mining company in the department of Oruro and in a telecommunications cooperative in Sucre. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

Articles 1, 2, and 3 of the Convention. Adjustment of the amount of fines (from 1,000 to 5,000 bolivianos) envisaged in Act No. 38 of 7 February 1944 (former Legislative Decree No. 38) to make them sufficiently dissuasive against acts of anti-union discrimination or interference. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, the Ministry of Labour plans to modify these fines, taking into account the circumstances of each violation, and adapting the amounts of the fines to the Housing Development Unit (UFV), a reference index that is regularly updated on the basis of the consumer price index. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect and hopes that the legislation will be reformed in the near future.

Articles 4 and 6. Denial of the right of public employees and other categories of workers to organize and therefore their right to collective bargaining. The Committee notes: (1) the Government's indication that the Office of the Superintendent of the Civil Service is conducting a study with a view to a possible amendment of the legislation so as to recognize the right to organize of public servants; and (2) that the draft Political Constitution of the State envisages the right to organize of all persons, and accordingly eliminates the current restriction. In this respect, the Committee recalls that, while Article 6 of the Convention allows public servants engaged in the administration of the State to be excluded from its scope, other categories should enjoy the guarantees of the Convention and therefore be able to negotiate collectively their conditions of employment, including wages (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 262). The Committee hopes that the new Constitution that is adopted will allow public officials covered by the Convention to benefit from the guarantees set out therein.

The Committee notes that, according to the ITUC, rural and agricultural workers are also denied the right to organize and to collective bargaining, but that these rights will be recognized in the future Constitution. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the legislation will recognize and implement union rights for these categories of worker.

The Committee previously requested the Government to take measures, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention, to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for collective bargaining between employers and their organizations and workers' organizations (on various occasions, the Committee had noted that collective bargaining covered wage increases, but rarely other conditions of employment). The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour has developed procedures at three levels: the first is based on the provisions of Presidential Decree No. 28699 of 1 May 2006, implemented by Ministerial Resolution No. 551/06 of December 2006, which provide for the participation of workers in the formulation of internal work rules. The second level lies with the General Directorate of Labour and Social Security, which is responsible for endorsing labour contracts, which have to be agreed between the parties, and the third level relates to departmental labour services, which are responsible for approving collective agreements. Collective bargaining is encouraged and promoted at the three levels. With regard to the third level, the Committee recalls that provisions of this kind are compatible with the Convention, provided that they merely stipulate that approval may be refused if the collective agreement has a procedural flaw or does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by general labour legislation. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the criteria used by departmental labour services to approve collective agreements and to transmit a copy of the agreements that they have approved recently.

The ITUC's 2007 comments. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the ITUC's comments, which referred to the slowness of legal proceedings in matters relating to the exercise of trade union rights. The Government indicates that the Ministry of Justice and Labour has prepared the draft text of the new Code of Labour Procedure, which has been submitted by the President to the Legislative Authority for approval. This will ensure greater rapidity and efficiency of judicial procedures through measures such as the imposition of penalties on administrative and judicial officials in the event of delays in the administration of justice and the reinstatement of workers in the event of unjustified dismissal. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in respect of this draft text and hopes that it will be adopted in the near future.

Draft new Constitution. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the provisions of the future Constitution will strengthen trade union rights. The Committee reminds the Government that ILO technical assistance is at its disposal with a view to ensuring that full effect is given to the Convention in the future legislation adopted under the new Constitution.

Botswana

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It further notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 29 August 2008, which mainly refer to legislative issues raised in its previous observation. The Committee asks the Government to provide full information on the progress made with respect to the legislative changes requested in its previous comment, which it repeats as follows:

- the amendment of section 2 of the Trade Disputes Act, section 2 of the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations (Amendment) Act, and section 35 of the Prisons Act so as to ensure that prison staff are afforded all the guarantees provided under the Convention;
- the adoption of specific legislative provisions ensuring adequate protection against acts of interference by employers or employers' organizations in the establishment, functioning or administration of trade unions, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions;
- the repeal of section 35(1)(b) of the Trade Disputes Act, which permits an employer or employers' organization to apply to the Commissioner to withdraw the recognition granted to a trade union on the grounds that the trade union refuses to negotiate in good faith with the employer;
- the amendment of section 20(3) of the Trade Disputes Act, so as to ensure that compulsory arbitration of disputes of interest is permissible only in the following instances: (1) where the party requesting arbitration is a trade union seeking a first collective agreement; (2) disputes concerning public servants directly engaged in the administration of the State; and (3) disputes arising in essential services.

Finally, the Committee requests the Government to provide its observations with respect to the ITUC's comments, according to which if a trade union is not registered, union committee members are not protected against anti-union discrimination.

Burkina Faso

The Committee notes the observations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning the transfer of over 100 officials by the General Directorate of the Treasury and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs against workers and militants who participated in protest actions. The Committee notes that according to the Government, the transfers were due to human resource imperatives, and not motivated by anti-union reasons.

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee notes that the Government has provided examples of collective agreements in force, namely the Interoccupational Collective Agreement of 1974 and the collective agreements for transport auxiliaries of 1979, for oil companies of 1976, for private education of 1979 and for trade of 1982. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, it is not possible to determine the number of workers covered by each collective agreement. However, the professional elections due to be held soon should help to determine the number. The Committee emphasizes that these collective agreements, on which the Government has yet to provide information, have been in force for a long time and hopes that the Government will be able soon to indicate the approximate number of workers covered by these agreements, and requests it to give an account of all measures to promote collective bargaining (including in the bakery, road transport and media sectors, in relation to which the Committee has requested information in its previous comments), taken in particular by the Directorate of Labour Relations and the Promotion of Social Dialogue.

Collective bargaining in the public sector. With regard to the public service advisory bodies, including the Tripartite Public Service Advisory Council, which is competent with regard to dialogue (section 51 of Act No. 013/98/AN of 13 April 1998 on the public service), the Committee notes the indication that the employees have not yet appointed their representatives and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

The Committee previously asked the Government to specify the categories of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State who enjoy the right to collective bargaining. It notes with regret that the Government's report does not contain information on this point. The Committee recalls that the Convention applies to all public servants not engaged in the administration of the State and requests the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee the right to collective bargaining on conditions of employment between their trade union organizations and the employers.

Cambodia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Free Trade Union of Workers of the Kingdom of Cambodia (FTUWKC), in communications of 29 August 2008. The Committee further notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2318 (351st Report).

In its previous comment, the Committee had taken note of the discussion on Cambodia in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2007, and in particular that the Conference Committee had expressed its deep concern at the statements made concerning the assassination of the trade unionists Chea Vichea, Ros Sovannareth, and Hy Vuthy; death threats; and the emerging climate of impunity in the country. The Conference Committee, recalling that the rights of workers' and employers' organizations could only be exercised in a climate free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations, had called upon the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure respect for this fundamental principle and bring an end to impunity; it further urged the Government to take steps immediately to ensure full and independent investigations into the murders of the abovementioned Cambodian trade union leaders so as to bring not only the perpetrators, but also the instigators of these heinous crimes to justice.

Having also noted the ITUC's comments on the irregularities that had attended the trials of Born Samnang and Sok Sam Oeun, the two men convicted of Chea Vichea's murder despite substantial evidence of their innocence, and numerous acts of harassment and violence against trade union leaders, the Committee had urged the Government to take the necessary measures, including the initiation of judicial inquiries, to bring an end to the acts of violence and intimidation against trade union officials and members. Finally, the Committee had noted the Government's acceptance of an ILO direct contacts mission, as requested by the Conference Committee, and had expressed the firm hope that the mission would achieve significant results in respect of all of the serious matters raised above.

Against this backdrop, the Committee notes with concern that according to the FTUWKC, a campaign of systematic violence and repression has been carried out against it in one factory, comprising vicious attacks on union leaders by gangs outside the factory; the violent dispersal of a FTUWKC rally, in which one worker was shot in the back by the police and 16 trade unionists were arrested and detained; the dismissal of 1,500 workers following the protest, virtually all of whom were FTUWKC leaders or members; and the subsequent blacklisting of the dismissed individuals by the management, which had distributed their names and photos to other factories. The FTUWKC also asserts that the authorities have done little to investigate the serious injuries inflicted on union leaders, and in fact have been regularly involved in the violent suppression of worker protests, strikes and marches at various factories.

The ITUC also indicates that in many factories trade unionists continue to face repression of all kinds, with virtually no intervention from the authorities. Anti-union acts include beatings from hired thugs, death threats, blacklisting, the bringing of trade unionists before the courts on false charges, wage deductions and exclusion from promotion. One FTUWKC leader was beaten by four or five masked individuals armed with iron rods on his way home from work. The ITUC also refers to the continued obstruction of the activities of the Cambodian Independent Teachers' Association (CITA), which the Government does not recognize as a trade union and whose demonstrations and protests have often been prohibited. Another organization, the Cambodian Independent Civil Service Association (CICSA), is also not recognized as a trade union.

Finally, the Committee takes note of the report of the direct contacts mission to Cambodia, held on 21 to 25 April 2008. The Committee notes with grave concern that the mission report contains, inter alia, the following conclusions: (1) that the Cambodian judiciary is plagued by serious problems of capacity and a lack of independence, (2) that the conviction of Born Samnang and Sok Sam Oeun for the murder of trade union leader Chea Vichea was upheld on 12 April 2007, in a trial marked by procedural irregularities, including the Court's refusal to entertain evidence of their innocence; (3) that Thach Saveth was sentenced to 15 years in prison for the murder of trade union leader Ros Sovannareth; and (4) that no concrete steps had been indicated by the Government to ensure a meaningful and independent review of the outstanding cases. The Committee notes with concern, moreover, that it has received no information on any progress made in the investigation respecting Hy Vuthy.

In these circumstances, the Committee can only deplore the absence of any further developments in this regard in the Government's report, six months after the direct contacts mission. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures to take concrete and tangible steps, as a matter of urgency: (1) to carry out independent inquiries, as a matter of urgency, into the murders of Chea Vichea, Ros Sovannareth and Hy Vuthy; (2) to facilitate an expedited review of the convictions of Born Samnang and Sok Sam Oeun for the murder of Chea Vichea, as well as the conviction of Thach Saveth for the murder of Ros Sovannareth, and to take steps for their release pending the outcome of the above independent inquiries; (3) to take the necessary steps to ensure the independence and effectiveness of the judicial system, including capacity-building measures and the institution of safeguards against corruption. In this regard, the Committee suggests that the Government have recourse to the technical cooperation facilities of the Office, notably in the area of reinforcing institutional capacity, as well as with respect to the establishment of labour courts and the revision of the Law on Trade Unions. Finally, it urges the Government, as also requested by the Committee on Freedom of Association, to take all necessary measures to ensure that the trade union rights of workers in Cambodia are fully respected and that trade unionists are able to exercise their activities in a climate free of intimidation and risk to their personal security and their lives.

The Committee is addressing a request on other points directly to the Government.

Cape Verde

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Very low number of collective agreements. The Committee had noted that the Government had sent copies of two collective agreements (telecommunications and private security) and indicated that collective bargaining must be voluntary and that the Government's role is to promote it without forcing it. The Government added that the Office's technical assistance to strengthen the capacities of the social partners in collective bargaining techniques would contribute to improving the situation. The Government indicates that the social partners are in agreement to request this technical assistance.

The Committee requests again the Government to continue its efforts to promote collective bargaining and hopes that the technical assistance requested by the Government with the agreement of the social partners will be provided in the near future.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Central African Republic

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes with regret that once again the Government's report does not contain any reply to its previous comments. The Committee notes the communication from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2008, reiterating its previous observations on the application of the Convention. The Committee urges the Government to provide comments in reply to the observations from the ITUC to the effect that wages in the public sector are determined by the Government after consultation with the unions but without any negotiation. In this regard, the Committee emphasizes that the Convention also applies to officials not engaged in the administration of the State and requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that they enjoy the right to collective bargaining.

Article 4 of the Convention. For many years the Committee has been asking the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation so that the negotiation of collective agreements by "professional groupings" is only possible where no trade union exists. The Committee reminds the Government that the Convention promotes collective bargaining between representative organizations of employers and workers and urges the Government once again to amend the legislation accordingly. Noting the indication that a draft new Labour Code is being drawn up to remedy the deficiencies vis-à-vis the Convention, the Committee trusts that the Government will take this point fully into consideration.

Chad

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 27 August 2007. The Committee recalls that these comments were concerned with acts of anti-union violence, particularly a number of demonstrating workers who were reportedly injured and one detained by the police for having asked their employer to comply with an arbitration award which recognized the violation of their rights. The Committee regrets that the Government categorically denies these allegations without indicating whether an investigation had been undertaken. In this regard, the Committee recalls that it has previously emphasized that, when disorders have occurred involving loss of human life or serious injury, the setting up of an independent judicial inquiry is a particularly appropriate method of fully ascertaining the facts, determining responsibilities, punishing those responsible and preventing the repetition of such actions (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 29). The Committee also notes the recent comment from the ITUC, dated 29 August 2008, regarding legislative matters which are already under examination and containing allegations of acts of interference from the Government in trade union affairs and also acts of intimidation and violence against strikers on 5 June 2007. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations concerning these new comments from the ITUC. The Committee also notes Case No. 2581 examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association, in the context of which serious violations of trade union rights are alleged (see 351st Report). The Committee reiterates that it has been making comments on the following points for a number of years.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers without distinction whatsoever to establish and join organizations without prior authorization. The Committee previously observed that, under section 294(3) of the Labour Code, fathers, mothers or guardians may oppose the right to organize of young persons under 16 years of age. The Committee recalls that Article 2 guarantees all workers, without distinction whatsoever, the right to establish and join organizations. The Committee expresses the firm hope that section 294(3) will soon be amended to guarantee the right to organize to minors who have reached the legal minimum age (14 years) for access to the labour market, either as workers or as apprentices, without parental or guardian authorization being necessary. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on all measures adopted in this regard.

Article 3. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their administration and activities in full freedom. The Committee previously noted that section 307 of the Labour Code provides that the accounts and supporting documents relating to the financial transactions of trade unions must be submitted without delay to the labour inspector, when so requested. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in this regard that the Labour Code indeed provides for inspecting the financial operations of trade unions but that in practice neither labour inspectors nor controllers perform this activity. The Committee reiterates once again that inspection by the public authorities of trade union finances should not go beyond the organizations' obligation to submit periodic reports. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 307 of the Labour Code taking account of the abovementioned principle. The Committee also requests the Government once again to send copies of the instructions issued by the Director of labour and social security with regard to the inspection of the financial transactions of trade unions.

The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it requested the Government to take the appropriate measures to repeal or amend Decree No. 96/PR/MFPT/94 of 29 April 1994 in order to ensure full observance of the principles of freedom of association in the exercise of the right to strike in the public service. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that this Decree was repealed and replaced by Act No. 008/PR/07 of 9 May 2007 regulating the exercise of the right to strike in the public service. In this regard, the Committee raises the following points.

- Section 11(3) of the Act imposes the obligation to declare the “possible” duration of a strike. However, the Committee notes that, under section 13(1), non-compliance with this condition would result in an illegal strike. The Committee recalls that trade unions should be able to declare strikes of unlimited duration and considers that the legislation should be amended to this effect. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to this end.
- The Committee notes that strikes are permitted in “essential” public services, as listed in section 19 of the Act, on condition that a minimum service is provided (section 18). The Committee notes that, under sections 20 and 21, it is the public authorities (the Minister concerned) who have the discretion to determine the minimum services and the number of officials and employees who will ensure that they are maintained. In this regard, the Committee recalls that such a service should meet at least two requirements. Firstly, and this aspect is paramount, it must genuinely and exclusively be a minimum service, i.e. one which is limited to the operations which are strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population or the minimum requirements of the service, while maintaining the effectiveness of the pressure brought to bear. Secondly, since this system restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities. The parties might also envisage the establishment of a joint or independent body responsible for examining rapidly and without formalities the difficulties raised by the definition and application of such a minimum service and empowered to issue enforceable decisions (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 160 and 161). The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend the legislation to ensure that the minimum service is limited to the operations which are strictly necessary to avoid jeopardizing the life or normal living conditions of all or part of the population, that the workers' organizations concerned should be able to participate in defining such a service, along with the employers and the public authorities, and to indicate developments in this regard.
- Section 22(1) provides that any refusal by officials or employees to comply with requisition orders (sections 20 and 21) makes them liable to the penalties provided for by sections 100 and 101 of Act No. 017/PR/2001 issuing the general public service regulations. In this regard, the Committee notes that these legislative provisions describe the degrees of disciplinary penalties imposed by order of gravity, but without indicating those which correspond to the different degrees of fault. The Committee requests the Government to clarify the scope of penalties for contraventions of legal provisions and also requests it to indicate any other penalties which can be imposed for violations of Act No. 008/PR/2007 regulating the exercise of the right to strike in the public service.

The Committee notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2008, to the effect that: (1) the Government refuses, in the context of social dialogue, to recognize the Union of Trade Unions of Chad (UST) as the most representative organization; (2) some trade union leaders have been dismissed, transferred or prosecuted for anti-union reasons; and (3) the Government has refused to negotiate with the inter-trade union association which includes the UST.

The Committee notes that the Government declares these allegations to be unfounded and also refers to a number of agreements and examples of social dialogue.

Noting the ITUC's comments and the Government's report, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that neither the UST nor its leaders or members are discriminated against on account of their trade union activities and that, in the relations between the authorities and the UST, the status of the UST as the most representative trade union organization is given due consideration.

Hong Kong Special Administrative Region

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (notification: 1997)

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the need to provide further protection against anti-union discrimination and took note of the Government's indication concerning the drafting of an amendment Bill that would empower the Labour Tribunal to make an order of reinstatement/re-engagement in cases of unreasonable and unlawful dismissal without the need to secure the employer's consent. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has been working on the draft amendment Bill but that the Labour Advisory board, the high-level tripartite consultative committee on labour matters, has not reached an agreement on some technical details but will continue discussion of the matter. The Committee hopes that this Bill, which has been under examination since 1999, will soon be adopted so as to give legislative expression to the principle of adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. It requests the Government to indicate any progress made in this respect in its next report.

Article 4. Measures to promote collective bargaining. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to strengthen the collective bargaining framework, in particular with respect to the low levels of coverage of collective agreements which were not binding on the employer (see Committee on Freedom of Association, Case No. 1942), and the absence of an institutional framework for trade union recognition and collective bargaining. The Committee noted the measures taken by the Government to promote collective bargaining, in particular the encouragement of voluntary negotiations, by promoting tripartite dialogue at the industry level through industry-level tripartite committees in the catering, construction, theatre, logistics, property management, printing, hotel and tourism, cement and concrete, as well as retail industries. In this respect, the Committee recalled that tripartite dialogue could not function as a substitute for bipartite negotiations referred to by the Convention, and requested the Government to continue to provide information on measures adopted or contemplated for the promotion of new bipartite collective agreements through the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organizations and workers' organizations and to indicate any further sectors covered by collective agreements, as well as the level of coverage (number of collective agreements and workers covered). The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, collective agreements were signed in two other sectors, namely the cleaning services and tourism sectors and that the Labour Department encourages employers to maintain effective dialogue with employees' or workers' unions and to consult them on employment matters. Furthermore, the Labour Department produces promotional material and organizes seminars to promote voluntary and direct negotiation in the workplace. The Government indicates that it encourages voluntary bipartite negotiations at the industry level through the setting up of industry-based tripartite committees that contribute to create a positive climate that enables negotiation between employers' and workers' organizations in industries and individual enterprises. The Government emphasizes that voluntary negotiation has contributed to harmonious industrial relations which has had a considerable impact on the reduction of the number of work stoppages. Moreover, in March 2006, the Government organized a workshop with the participation of ILO officers on labour management cooperation, which included shared experiences concerning collective bargaining. The Committee takes note of this information but considers that the extent of coverage of collective bargaining is very low. The Committee requests the Government to take all the necessary measures to continue to promote voluntary bipartite negotiations in the private sector and to provide additional information concerning new sectors in which collective agreements have been concluded.

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the Hong Kong and Kowloon Trade Union Council with respect to the need for the Government to introduce legislation on collective bargaining rights. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments thereon.

Measures to promote collective bargaining for civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government: (1) to indicate any measures discussed or adopted as a result of the work of the consultative group, set up by the Government to work on an improved civil service pay adjustment mechanism; (2) to indicate any measure taken with a view to extending the right to collective bargaining to civil servants; and (3) to provide information on the activities covered by the civil service with a view to determining those categories of civil servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State.

With respect to the civil service pay adjustment mechanism, the Committee notes that according to the Government, after consultation with the employees, it has developed an improved civil service pay adjustment mechanism which comprises an improved methodology for the conduct of the annual pay trend survey, a framework for the conduct of periodic pay level surveys and a framework for the application of pay level survey results for the civil service. The Committee further notes the Government's indication to the effect that taking into account that all civil servants are engaged in the administration of the State, since they are responsible for formulating policies and strategies and performing law enforcement as well as regulatory functions, all of them are excluded from the application of the Convention. However, the existing consultation mechanism encourages effective communication between staff and management on matters concerning the terms and conditions of employment. Moreover, the Government is endeavouring to put in place procedures that will further engage staff representatives in more intensive consultations on terms and conditions of employment.

The Committee takes note of this information and recalls that, according to Article 4, civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State should enjoy not only the right to be consulted about their conditions of employment but also the right to bargain collectively. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the different categories and functions of the civil servants so as to identify which of them are in the administration of the State and which are not.

Colombia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes the comments made on the application of the Convention by the Single Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CUT), the General Confederation of Workers (CGT) and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC), dated 13 June 2008; by the CGT in a communication of 19 August 2008; the CTC in a communication of 22 August 2008; the CUT in communications dated 28 January, 13 June and 27 August; and the CUT and the CTC jointly in a communication dated 31 August. These communications refer to matters that are under examination by the Committee, and particularly to acts of violence against trade union leaders and members, including murders, kidnappings, attempted murder and disappearances; the grave impunity surrounding such acts; the use of associated labour cooperatives and other forms of contracts which make it impossible for workers to establish or join unions; the arbitrary refusal by the authorities to register new trade unions, new statutes or the executive committees of unions; and the prohibition of the exercise of the right to strike in certain services which go beyond essential services. The Committee also notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 29 August 2008, which are being translated. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the communication by the CUT dated 28 January 2008. It requests the Government to provide its comments on all the observations made by trade unions.

The Committee notes the discussions in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2008. It also notes the reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association on various cases that it is examining concerning Colombia, adopted at its sessions in March, June and November 2008.

Trade union rights and civil and political liberties

The Committee notes that the comments made by the CUT, CGT and CTC refer to the rise in the rate of murders of trade union leaders and members in 2008, amounting to ten trade union leaders and 30 trade union members. They also report an increase in the number of death threats. The trade union confederations recognize the efforts made by the Government to provide security to trade union leaders and members, but consider that they are not sufficient. They refer once again to the stigmatization of the trade union movement as sympathizing with the guerrillas and movements on the extreme left, which leaves them in a grave situation of vulnerability.

In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that during the course of 2007 the Government programme of protection for persons under threat took measures to the value of $13 million out of a total of $40 million. These measures were intended to protect the members of the trade union movement, who account for 20 per cent of the beneficiaries. For 2008, the investment budget is estimated at $45 million and up to June 2008 had benefitted 1,466 trade unionists, or 18 per cent of beneficiaries.

The Government adds that: (1) the trade union confederations were informed of the requirement for department police commanders to submit monthly reports to the Administrative Security Department, the Office of the Public Prosecutor General of the Nation and trade union leaders on the situation with regard to threats and the protection of trade unionists within their jurisdiction; and (2) a virtual network mechanism will be established to deal with risk alerts in real time in the same way as for mayors and councillors.

In this regard, while appreciating all the measures adopted by the Government, and particularly the increase in funding for the protection of trade union leaders and members, the Committee notes with deep concern the rise in the number of trade union leaders and members who have been murdered. The Committee emphasizes the need to eradicate violence so that workers' and employers' organizations can exercise their activities in full freedom. The Committee once again firmly urges the Government to continue taking all the necessary measures to guarantee the right to life and safety of trade union leaders and members so as to allow the due exercise of the rights guaranteed by the Convention.

With reference to the measures to combat impunity, the CUT, CGT and CTC recognize the efforts made by the Office of the Prosecutor General of the Nation to proceed with investigations into cases of grave violations of the human rights of trade unionists, but emphasize that only a very low percentage of investigations reach the courts and result in the conviction of those responsible. They also emphasize the lack of information on the situation of the proceedings in a large number of complaints of acts of violence against trade unions and that investigations are not systematic. The trade union organizations further regret that the decongestion courts are not of a permanent nature.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in this respect that the national general budget for 2008 authorized the Office of the Prosecutor General to increase its personnel by 2,166 officials, which will mean that the special subunit for cases of trade unionists could increase in size to 19 prosecutors (it previously had 13). The Government adds that it will continue offering rewards of up to US$250,000 for information leading the capture of those responsible for crimes against trade unionists. It adds that Act No. 599 of 2000 deems the murder of trade unions leaders to be aggravated homicide, but not the murder of members of the trade union movement. For this reason, the Government submitted to the legislature Bill No. 308 in June 2008 seeking to increase sentences from 17 to 30 years for the murder of trade union members and to impose fines of up to 300 minimum wages on employers which restrict freedom of association. Moreover, at the request of the national Government, the Higher Judicial Council, through the decision of 25 June 2008, made the three decongestion courts established in July 2007 permanent. These courts have been devoted exclusively to ruling on cases of violations of the rights of trade unionists, issuing 44 sentences in 2007 and 24 up to July 2008.

The Committee also notes the Government's indication that the monthly report on the protection of trade union leaders and members and on impunity was presented to the Inter-Institutional Commission on the Human Rights of Workers, held on 29 July 2008, which included the participation of representatives of workers, employers, the Government and the ILO representative in Colombia. According to the Office of the Prosecutor General, of a total of 117 convictions, it was found in 21 cases that the reason for the acts of violence was the trade union activity of the victim. Under the terms of these 117 sentences, 192 persons were convicted and 128 imprisoned. Of the total of 117 convictions, 115 were handed down during the term of the present Government and 68 were issued over the past three months as a result of the establishment of decongestion courts. Of the 192 convictions, responsibility was found to lie with the public authorities in 15 cases, with the Self-Defence Units of Colombia in 93 cases, with the guerrillas in 24 cases, with a group outside the law in one case, with a trade unionist in one case, with common delinquents in 56 cases and with the Aguilas Negras (an emerging group) in two cases.

The Committee notes that in its conclusions in 2008 the Committee on the Application of Standards, while noting the efforts made by the Office of the Public Prosecutor of the Nation to secure progress in the investigation of serious human rights violations against trade unionists, as well as the appointment of three judges especially dedicated to hearing cases of violence against trade unionists (decongestion courts), expressed its concern at the increase in acts of violence against trade unionists in the first half of 2008 and urged the Government to take further steps to reinforce the available protection measures and to ensure that investigations of murders of trade unionists are more effective and expeditious.

The Committee notes all the measures adopted by the Government and the efforts made, which are recognized by trade union organizations, to carry out investigations of violations of the human rights of trade unionists. Nevertheless, it regrets that the number of convictions continues to fall and that a large number of investigations are only at the preliminary stages. Under these conditions, the Committee requests the Government to continue taking all the measures possible to carry forward and facilitate all investigations relating to acts of violence against the trade union movement and expresses the firm hope that the measures adopted recently concerning the appointment of new prosecutors and judges will reduce the situation of impunity and will clarify the acts of violence committed against trade union leaders and members, and result in the apprehension of those responsible. The Committee emphasizes the role played by the decongestion judges and hopes that they will continue discharging their duties.

Furthermore, the Committee recalls that it requested the Government to keep it informed of the manner in which Act No. 975 on justice and peace is applied, particularly in cases involving trade union leaders and members. The Committee notes that, according to the trade union organizations, paramilitaries who have submitted to the rule of law have provided very little information on the murder of trade unionists and trade union leaders. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide the information requested.

Pending legislative and practical matters

The Committee recalls that it has been making comments, in some instances for many years, on the following matters.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. The Committee referred previously to the use of various types of contractual arrangements, such as associated work cooperatives, service contracts and civil or commercial contracts which cover actual employment relationships and are used for the performance of functions and work that are within the normal activities of the establishment and under which workers may not establish or join trade unions. In this respect, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that full effect is given to Article 2 of the Convention so that all workers, without distinction whatsoever, enjoy the right to establish and join unions. The Committee notes the Government's indication concerning the regulations applicable to temporary service enterprises and cooperatives. In particular, the Committee notes the Government's indication of the approval by the Congress of the Republic, on 22 July 2008, of Act No. 1233 respecting associated work cooperatives, following lengthy consultations with the representative organizations of associated work cooperatives, workers' federations, branch organizations representing employers and academic circles. The Act regulates the activities of associated work cooperatives, third-party contractors and the competence of the Supervisory Authority for Economic Solidarity and the Ministry of Social Protection to impose penalties. According to the Government, the most important features of the Act include: (1) that it establishes the minimum wage as the basis for ordinary compensation and the requirement to pay contributions to the social security, employment injury and pension branches and compensation funds; (2) employment placement is prohibited and, where it occurs, employers' responsibilities apply to cooperatives and third-party contractors; and (3) it establishes a self-governing code for representative organizations of cooperatives and a commitment by representative organizations of cooperatives in relation to the principles of the ILO and those of the International Co-operative Alliance. The Committee observes that a reading of the Act shows that: (1) section 3 establishes ordinary monthly compensation in accordance with the work performed, productivity and the quantity of work undertaken by the "associated worker"; (2) section 9 refers to workers "who provide their services in associated work cooperatives or pre-cooperatives"; (3) under the terms of section 12, "the social object of cooperatives and pre-cooperatives consists of generating and maintaining work for associates in a self-managed manner, with autonomy, self-determination and self-direction"; (4) section 12, second paragraph, provides that "associated work cooperatives whose activity is the provision of services to the health, transport, vigilance, private security and education sectors shall be specialized in the respective branch of activity"; and (5) the organizations of cooperatives to which the Act refers are not trade union bodies. Observing that the Act itself refers to the "workers" of cooperatives, the Committee recalls that under the terms of Article 2 of the Convention, all workers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee also recalls that the criterion for determining the persons covered by this right is not based on the existence of a labour relationship with an employer and that the concept of worker includes not only dependent workers, but also workers who are self-employed or autonomous. In this respect, the Committee considers that associated workers in cooperatives should be able to establish and join the trade union organizations of their own choosing. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee explicitly that all workers, without distinction, including workers in cooperatives and those covered by other forms of contracts, irrespective of the existence of a labour relationship, enjoy the guarantees afforded by the Convention.

Rights to establish organizations without previous authorization. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the arbitrary refusal by the authorities to register new trade union organizations, new trade union rules or the executive committee of a trade union at the discretion of the authorities for reasons that go beyond the explicit provisions of the legislation. The Committee requested the Government to take steps to amend the provision of Decree No. 1651 of 2007 which established as one of the grounds for denying registration "that the trade union organization has been established, not to guarantee the fundamental right of association, but to secure labour stability" and to register new organizations or executive committees, as well as amendments to rules, without undue delay. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, by virtue of the Substantive Labour Code, the grounds for refusing to register a trade union are limited and that the decision by the Ministry of Social Protection not to register a trade union when it does not comply with the respective legal requirements is not a discretionary power. Furthermore, such a decision has to be based on a reasoned administrative decision that is subject to administrative and judicial appeal. The Committee nevertheless notes that Resolution No. 1651 has been repealed by Resolution No. 626 of February 2008, although the latter resolution includes in section 2 among the grounds upon which the competent official may refuse an entry in the trade union register, "that the trade union organization has been established for purposes that are different from those deriving from the fundamental right of association". In this respect, the Committee recalls once again that Article 2 of the Convention guarantees the right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization from the public authorities and that national regulations governing the constitution of organizations are not in themselves incompatible with the provisions of the Convention, provided that they are not equivalent to a requirement for previous authorization and do not constitute such an obstacle that they amount in practice to a prohibition (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 68 and 69). The Committee further considers that the administrative authority should not be able to deny registration of an organization merely because it considers that it might devote itself to activities that although legal may go beyond normal trade union activities. In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to abrogate the provision of Resolution No. 626 of February 2008 which establishes as one of the grounds for refusing entry into the register for a trade union organization "that the trade union organization has been established for purposes other than those deriving from the fundamental right of association" and to register new organizations, executive committees and amendments to rules without undue delay.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee also referred previously to the prohibition of strikes, not only in essential services in the strict sense of the term, but also in a very broad range of services that are not necessarily essential (section 430(b), (d), (f), (g) and (h); section 450(1)(a) of the Labour Code, Tax Act No. 633/00 and Decrees Nos 414 and 437 of 1952, 1543 of 1955, 1593 of 1959, 1167 of 1963, 57 and 534 of 1967) and the possibility to dismiss workers who have intervened or participated in an unlawful strike (section 450(2) of the Labour Code), even when the unlawful nature of the strike is a result of requirements that are contrary to the principles of freedom of association. The Committee previously requested the Government, in the context of a Bill that was being examined by Congress and which envisaged certain amendments to the Labour Code, to amend the provisions referred to above and invited the Government to have recourse to the Office's technical assistance. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) when assessing the divergent interests, for the purpose of defining essential public services, the legislator has to start from a serious objective and reasonable basis so that the respective regulation maintains proportionality between compliance with the fundamental rights of users and the right to strike of workers; (2) the Constitution recognizes the right to strike, although it is not absolute; and (3) under the terms of Act No. 1210 of 14 July 2008, the Standing Dialogue Commission on Wage and Labour Policies, which is tripartite, shall submit a report within six months on the draft texts that it has submitted in relation to articles 55 (collective bargaining) and 56 (strike action and essential services) of the Constitution. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in amending the legislation with regard to the very broad range of services in which, as they are deemed essential, the right to strike is prohibited, and section 450, second paragraph, under which workers who have participated in a strike in such services can be dismissed.

Declaring a strike illegal. The Committee previously noted the formulation of a Bill under which the competence to declare strikes illegal was transferred from the Ministry of Social Protection to the judicial authorities. The Committee notes with satisfaction that Act No. 1210 has amended section 451 of the Substantive Labour Code to read as follows: "the legality or illegality of a collective work suspension or stoppage shall be declared by the judicial authorities in a priority procedure".

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee referred previously to the authority of the Minister of Labour to refer a dispute to arbitration when a strike exceeds a certain period – 60 days – (section 448(4) of the Labour Code). The Committee noted a Bill to amend this section, providing that where it is not possible to achieve a definitive solution, the parties or one of them shall request the Ministry of Social Protection to convene an arbitration board. The Committee notes that Act No. 1210 amends section 448(4) of the Labour Code and provides that: (1) the employer and the workers may, within the following three days, convene any settlement, conciliation or arbitration machinery; (2) if they do not reach agreement, automatically or at the request of the parties, the Commission for Dialogue on Wage and Labour Policies shall intervene and use its good offices for a maximum of five days; (3) once this period has elapsed without it being possible to achieve a definitive solution, both parties shall request the Ministry of Social Protection to convene an Arbitration Board; and (4) the workers shall be under the obligation to return to work within three days. In this respect, the Committee considers that, except in essential services in the strict sense of the term or in the case of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, the convening of the Arbitration Board should only be possible where both parties so decide voluntarily in common agreement. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 448(4) as indicated above.

Article 6. Restrictions imposed on the actions of federations and confederations. The Committee referred previously to the prohibition on the calling of strikes by federations and confederations (section 417(i) of the Labour Code). The Committee recalled that higher level organizations should be able to resort to strikes in the event of disagreement with the Government's economic and social policy and requested the Government to amend the above provision. The Committee notes the Government's indication that federations and confederations cannot be assimilated to first-level organizations since those who hold a legal interest in collective bargaining are the workers who are members of enterprise, industry or branch trade unions and the employers to whom lists of claims have been submitted. The Government adds that if federations and confederations do not have a legal interest in collective bargaining, then they clearly have much less interest in strikes. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the guarantees provided to first-level organizations by Article 6 of the Convention also apply to higher level organizations. Indeed, in order to defend the interests of their members more effectively, workers' and employers' organizations need to have the right to establish federations and confederations of their own choosing, which should themselves enjoy the various rights accorded to first-level organizations, in particular as regards their freedom of operation, activities and programmes (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 195 and 198). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 417(i) so as not to prohibit the right to strike of federations and confederations.

Observing that it has been making comments for many years, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures without delay to amend the legislative provisions commented upon and bring them into conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures adopted in this respect.

The Committee is addressing a request directly to the Government on another point.

Congo

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008 on the application of the Convention. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has still not provided its observations on the ITUC comments, dated 10 August 2006, concerning the arrest for 24 hours of eight trade union representatives on 27 October 2005. In this regard, the Committee would like to remind the Government that the arrest and detention, even for short periods, of trade union leaders and members engaged in their legitimate trade union activities, without any charges being brought and without a warrant, constitute a grave violation of the principle of freedom of association (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 31).

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report does not contain any information on the issues it has been raising for a number of years. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it requested the Government to amend the legislation on the minimum service organized by the employer to be maintained in the public service that is indispensable for safeguarding the general interest (section 248-15 of the Labour Code), in order to limit the minimum service to operations which are strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population, within the framework of a negotiated minimum service. In this regard, the Committee noted that the Government had indicated that section 248-15 had indeed been amended but that it was not in a position to produce the copy of the text amending the provisions of the said section. The Committee recalls that, since the definition of a minimum service restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities. The parties might also envisage the establishment of a joint or independent body responsible for examining rapidly and without formalities the difficulties raised by the definition and application of such a minimum service and empowered to issue enforceable decisions (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 161). The Committee again expresses the hope that the text amending section 248-15 of the Labour Code takes account of these principles and requests the Government to send it a copy of the text as soon as possible.

The Committee had also requested the Government to indicate any developments in the revision of the Labour Code in its next report and to send it a copy of any draft amendment to that Code in order to ensure its conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee had noted the Government's indication that the revision work had been completed and that the draft had been submitted for opinion to the National Labour Advisory Commission. The Committee requests the Government to send it a copy of the draft revised Labour Code.

Costa Rica

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the comments on the application of the Convention made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the Confederation of Workers Rerum Novarum (CTRN), the Petroleum, Chemical and Similar Workers' Union (SITRAPEQUIA) and the Costa Rica Union of Chambers and Associations of Private Enterprises (UCCAEP), which relate mainly to issues that are already under examination. The Committee noted in its previous observations the report of the high-level mission which visited the country from 2 to 6 October 2006. The Committee notes Cases Nos 2490 and 2518 examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association at its November 2007 meeting, which confirm the dismissals of a large number of trade unionists, as well as a number of rulings of the Supreme Court which had found that certain clauses of collective agreements in public sector institutions or enterprises were unconstitutional.

The Committee recalls that the problems relating to the application of the Convention which it raised in its previous observation were as follows:

- the slowness and ineffectiveness of recourse procedures and compensation in the event of anti-union acts (according to the high-level mission, the slowness of procedures in cases of anti-union discrimination results in a period of not less than four years to obtain a final ruling);
- the subjection of collective bargaining in the public sector to criteria of proportionality and rationality in accordance with the case law of the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice which has declared unconstitutional a considerable number of clauses of collective agreements in the public sector at the instigation of the public authorities (the Ombudsperson, the Office of the Public Prosecutor) or of a political party; and
- the enormous disproportion in the private sector between the number of collective agreements concluded with trade unions (much lower) and the number of direct agreements concluded with non-unionized workers (the Committee previously called for an independent investigation into this matter, which took place and the relevant report has been prepared).

The Committee notes the comments made by the UCCAEP on the application of the Convention in which it refers to the comprehensive standards applicable with regard to protection against anti-union discrimination and points out that the judicial authority may even order the reinstatement of a worker dismissed as a result of anti-union unfair practice. The UCCAEP indicates that the current legal framework allows non-member workers to appoint, by means of a majority election, a Permanent Workers' Committee to represent their interests against the employer (a committee which may, where appropriate, coexist with a trade union in the same enterprise), and that no form of association of workers other than the trade union may interfere in matters relating to collective bargaining, trade union functions or aims.

The ITUC comments that the administrative procedures against anti-union dismissals (which are subsequently referred to the judicial authority) are complex and ineffective and may take several years (in fact, the amparo appeal for enforcement of constitutional rights is abused in anti-union discrimination procedures); furthermore, employers are not obliged under any legal mechanism to comply with a reinstatement order. The ITUC confirms the Government's indication that the draft Act to reform labour procedures is being examined by a tripartite committee. The ITUC indicates that in the private sector trade unions are practically non-existent and that those which do exist are permanently submitting complaints to the Labour Inspectorate of trade union persecution. According to the ITUC, the Ministry of Labour and Social Security promotes direct agreements with non-unionized workers through publications. There are special problems with regard to the application of the Convention and anti-union discrimination in export processing zones, pineapple enterprises and banana enterprises. The Committee points out that the recent comments of the ITUC concerning the very low number of trade unions in the private sector will be examined in 2009 in the framework of the examination of the application of Convention No. 87.

The SITRAPEQUIA and the CTRN emphasize the gravity of the problem of collective bargaining in the public sector and the constraints placed on public employers by the Committee on Negotiation Policy.

The CTRN and the country's other confederations hold the view that the long delay in the adoption of draft legislative reforms and the ratification of Conventions Nos 151 and 154 demonstrate the lack of interest in moving forward.

The Committee observes that the Government refers to the statements made in its previous reports to the effect that: (1) the Government possesses the will and commitment to resolve the problems raised by the Committee of Experts; (2) it has requested the ILO's technical assistance and trusts that this will enable it to overcome the problems raised; (3) the Government's efforts (many of them supported by tripartite agreement) relating to these problems have included the submission of several legislative proposals to the Legislative Assembly and their reconsideration: a draft constitutional amendment to article 192, a Bill on collective bargaining in the public sector, and the addition of subsection 5 to section 112 of the General Act on Public Administration (the three initiatives are intended to strengthen collective bargaining in the public sector); a draft amendment to the chapter of the Labour Code on freedom of association; approval of ILO Conventions Nos 151 and 154; draft texts to revise various sections of the Labour Code, Act No. 2 of 26 August 1943, and sections 10, 15, 16, 17 and 18 of Legislative Decree No. 832 of 4 November 1949 and its amendments; a draft Act to reform labour procedures (aimed at the elimination of delays and introducing the principle of hearings, and the establishment of summary procedures for cases of anti-union discrimination); (4) the Government's efforts have also included other types of initiatives in legal actions of unconstitutionality brought in order to annul specific clauses in the agreements; and the reinforcement of alternative dispute settlement procedures through the Centre for Alternative Settlement of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, which increased the number of persons dealt with in 2005 to 3,329. The Government indicated that in 2005 complaints of anti-union discrimination related to 38 cases; (5) the current Government has the will to push forward draft legislation to resolve pending problems and has maintained contact with the Executive, including the Ministry of the Presidency, and the Legislative, (including deputies from various parties, as well as the leaders of the principal opposition party which also supports the reforms sought by the ILO), for the re-examination of the draft texts in question. The Government states that it has sent reports to the judiciary forwarding the observations and positions of the Committee of Experts. The Government lays emphasis on the follow-up meetings held by the Minister of Labour and Social Security, on occasions with the technical assistance of the ILO subregional office, with this assistance including the gathering of information on matters relating to Conventions Nos 151 and 154 on collective bargaining. The Government adds that it held a meeting with numerous representatives of all the sectors involved (the authorities, civil society, etc.) to analyse and seek consensus for the draft legislation to reform labour procedures which is awaiting the opinion of the Legal Affairs Commission of the Legislative Assembly.

Additionally, the Committee notes the statements made by the Government to the effect that:

- there has been a substantial change in the case law given that, the Second Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice recently declared in a ruling (by a vote of six judges to one) that: (1) the conclusion cannot be drawn that the Constitutional Chamber has prohibited collective agreements in the public sector and it found that collective agreements concerning public employees – whose relations are governed by the labour laws, even though they belong to the public sector – and servants were not unconstitutional (in particular, the collective agreement relating to the case concerned, which does not constitute excessive privileges for workers despite having been presented by the Ombudsperson for alleged unconstitutionality); (2) Convention No. 98 supersedes domestic law; (3) the regulations in force on collective bargaining in the public sector are an important legal matter. According to the Government, in view of the above, this ruling of the Supreme Court could prevent new contestations of clauses of collective agreements in the public sector;
- the Government has carried out a series of actions (mentioned above) in relation to all the problems raised by the Committee of Experts, which shows the political commitment to resolving those problems; training and information activities aimed at the leaders of the three authorities of the State (legislative, executive and judicial) have been carried out, such as the forum on the dissemination of the right to collective bargaining in the public sector (March 2008) which benefited from technical assistance from the ILO and the participation of representatives at the highest level of the three authorities of the State, as well as the social partners; training programmes for judges and the social dialogue forum (organized by the Second Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice);
- the Higher Labour Council (a tripartite body) has revived a special committee for the examination and analysis of the draft text reforming labour procedures which is intended to overcome the problem of the slowness of procedures in the event of anti-union acts and strengthen the right to collective bargaining in the public sector; during this financial year, the technical assistance of the ILO has been sought to ensure conformity with the provisions of Conventions Nos 87 and 98 and the special committee has been provided with the report of the ILO technical assistance on the draft;

- the slowness of justice is being tackled by the judicial authority and consequently, greater human resources have been allocated and the processes have been sped up in several ways (introduction of hearings, etc.), new courts of minor jurisdiction have been created in various areas of the country; in 2007, the judicial authority concluded 24,501 cases (despite having received 21,897 cases during that year); furthermore, on 12 March 2008, the Conciliation Centre under the judiciary, which works preventatively, was created; the Government is continuing in turn to develop alternative means for the settlement of disputes and the judiciary is continuing its programme to tackle judicial delays aimed at clearing the backlog of the judicial bodies by calling on supernumerary judges;
- there is a plan for the implementation of the recommendations made in the report of the high-level mission which visited the country in 2006.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments relating to the draft texts which have been before the Legislative Assembly for a number of years and the aim of achieving greater efficiency and speed in the procedures for protection against anti-union discrimination and collective bargaining in the public sector, as well as on any developments relating to the case law of the Supreme Court of Justice on this matter.

The Committee continues to consider that the situation of trade union rights is precarious. The Committee welcomes the desire shown by the current Government to push forward draft legislation, in many cases with tripartite support for a number of years, with a view to complying with the Convention and giving effect to the Committee's comments. The Committee expresses its very firm hope that the various draft texts that are currently under examination will be adopted in the very near future and that they will be in full conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the progress made in this respect and hopes that an improvement in the application of the rights and guarantees set forth in the Convention will be the outcome of this political will.

With regard to the matter of the negotiation of direct agreements with non-unionized workers, the Committee recalls that, according to the study carried out by the independent expert "according to the statistics provided by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, there are now in force 74 direct agreements, while only 13 collective agreements remain in force"; "it is also an established fact, as well as being clear and evident, that it is the latter (employers) who propose, defend and claim them and who, in particular, take the initiative for their conclusion". The study also refers to the phenomenon of intervention by employers in the election of standing committees, including the imposition of candidates, public disqualification or vetoes, etc.; ballots are not secret and electors can be intimidated. According to the mission report "although it is not correct to say that in all cases the election of the members of standing committees is a result of processes that are fixed and not authentic, it can be said that the very conception of standing committees and the long-standing practices for their establishment clearly lack the elementary guarantees of democratic authenticity ..., and the indispensable conditions of independence and representativeness are not present". The expert's report indicates that standing committees lack the resources and the capacity to engage in a dialogue with employers that ensures a certain balance in negotiations. In general, the expert's study shows that standing committees have been used to prevent the establishment of trade union organizations or to impede their activities.

In its previous observation, the Committee noted these conclusions with concern and drew the Government's attention to the importance of these matters being submitted for tripartite examination so as to remedy the existing disproportion between the number of collective agreements and of direct agreements with non-unionized workers and so as to facilitate the formulation of the legal and other means necessary to prevent standing committees and direct agreements from having an anti-union impact in practice, and also from being established where there is already a trade union organization. The Committee recalls once again that, under the terms of Article 2 of the Convention, the State is under the obligation to guarantee adequate protection against any acts of interference by employers in workers' organizations, and that Article 4 of the Convention enshrines the principle of the promotion of collective bargaining between workers' organizations and employers or employers' organizations.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (1) collective bargaining is recognized by the Constitution and is therefore granted privileged protection under the national legal system; in fact, in accordance with an administrative instruction of 4 May 1991, if it is found that a company has a union that is recognized for bargaining purposes, the General Labour Inspectorate shall reject any direct agreements immediately so as not to hinder the negotiation of a collective agreement; (2) the independent expert refers to facts which suggest a contradiction with the commitment provided for in Article 4 of the Convention referring to promoting the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers and workers; for this reason, given that the report in question was received recently and taking into account the Committee of Experts' recommendation to the Government concerning the importance of this document together with its conclusions being submitted for tripartite examination so as to remedy the existing imbalance between the number of collective agreements and direct agreements, the Ministry of Labour and Social Security has sent a complete copy of the study in question to each of the members of the Higher Labour Council; (3) in this regard, the Government undertakes to keep the Committee informed of any progress made by the Council in the analysis of the expert's report, which includes finding a satisfactory solution to the situation by means of genuine social dialogue and calling upon any technical assistance which the ILO may be able to offer on this matter, to prevent standing committees and direct agreements from having the anti-union impact in practice referred to by the independent expert in his report; (4) the matter is complex and the Government hopes to be able to provide, in the near future, a balanced proposal which offers a satisfactory solution to the situation referred to by the independent expert.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the tripartite evaluation of the problem of direct agreements with non-unionized workers, undertaken in the light of the expert's report, as well as any satisfactory solution proposed.

The Committee also requests the Government to provide its comments on the recent communication of the CTRN dated 12 September 2008.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee had noted in its previous observation the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the serious obstruction of trade union activities in certain administrations and enterprises, and the comments from the Confederation of Trade Unions of Congo (CSC) relating to the arrest of trade unionists and threats towards trade union delegates, particularly in public enterprises. In its report, received in June 2008, the Government states that the cases denounced by the CSC took place during a period in which lawlessness and impunity reigned. The Government gives its assurance that such occurrences would not happen again. The Committee takes note of this statement, but recalls that a Government cannot turn away from the responsibility that events under a previous Government might have incurred. The new Government is responsible for any repercussions these events might have and it should take all the necessary measures to counter the consequences of the actions committed under the previous Government or system. To the extent in which it is incumbent upon the public authorities to maintain a social climate in which law prevails, it is important that investigations should be carried out on the anti-trade union actions to ensure that those responsible for such actions should be brought before the courts and punished in accordance with the law. The Committee hopes that the Government will spare no efforts to launch the necessary investigations on the alleged cases of anti-trade union actions against workers' organizations and their representatives.

The Committee notes the observations from the ITUC dated 29 August 2008 concerning cases of violation of the Convention in 2007, in particular arrests and acts of violence against strikers. The Government is requested to send comments in reply to the observations made by the ITUC.

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 1 of the Labour Code excluded from its scope of application magistrates, career officials in the state public services governed by the general conditions of service, and career employees and officials of the state public services governed by specific conditions of service. The Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the trade union rights of these categories of state employees. The Committee had also noted that, by virtue of section 56 of Act No. 81-003 of 17 July 1981 issuing the conditions of service of career members of the state public services, public officials and employees were affiliated automatically to the then Union of Workers of Zaire (UNTZA). However, pending the amendment of these conditions of service, the Minister for the Public Service had issued Order No. CAB.MIN/F.P./105/94 of 13 January 1994 establishing provisional regulations respecting trade union activities within the public administration, amended by Order No. CAB.MIN/F.P./0174/96 of 13 September 1996. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, the reform of the public administration is under way and that it will bring about a revision of the conditions of service of career members of the state public services. The Committee trusts that the reform of the public administration will allow, as soon as possible, all state employees to benefit from the guarantees provided under the Convention. It requests the Government to indicate any new developments in this respect, in particular the repeal of section 56 of Act No. 81-003.

Article 3. The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that trade union elections were organized in various branches of activity and to provide specific information on the results of these elections. In its report, the Government undertakes to do the necessary in this respect and to communicate information on the organization of trade union elections and the election results in the commerce sector. The Committee notes this information and trusts that the Government's next report will indicate progress in the organization of trade union elections in other branches of activity and contain the results of these elections.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes the Government's report in reply to the questions raised in 2007 by the Trade Union Confederation of the Congo (CSC) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention. According to the recent comments made by the ITUC, dated 29 August 2008, the Committee notes that most of the 400 trade unions in the private sector, mainly in the natural resources sector, do not have active members and were in fact created by employers to mislead workers and discourage initiatives to create genuine trade unions.

The Committee notes with interest that the Government states in its report that it intends to give effect to the Committee's recommendation to conduct an independent investigation in order to clarify the questions raised by the ITUC and by the CSC concerning: (1) acts of discrimination and anti-union interference in private enterprises (including threats of dismissal against union members despite the fact that section 234 of the Labour Code prohibits acts of anti-union discrimination); (2) the existence of many unions established and financed by employers; and (3) the failure to comply with collective agreements. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the developments and conclusions of the independent investigation.

Article 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee noted previously that, according to the Government, the National Labour Council has not yet adopted the draft Order prohibiting acts of interference. The Committee recalled that, although section 235 of the new Labour Code prohibits all acts of interference by organizations of employers and workers in each others' affairs, section 236 provides that acts of interference must be defined more precisely. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the effect that the National Labour Council has not yet taken a decision on the draft Order prohibiting acts of interference. To that end, the Committee notes that the Government undertakes to provide a copy of the Order once it has been adopted. The Committee hopes that the Order concerned will be adopted as soon as possible and requests the Government to provide information on developments in this regard.

Article 6. Collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee noted previously that section 1 of the Labour Code explicitly excludes from the Code career members of the state public services who are governed by the general conditions of service (Act No. 81-003 of 17 July 1981 issuing the conditions of service of career members of state public services and explicitly providing for the establishment of institutions ensuring the representation of the personnel) and career employees and officials of state public services who are governed by specific conditions of service. The CSC had indicated in its comments of 31 May 2004, the existence of measures allowing the establishment of mechanisms for the promotion of collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee had noted the information provided by the Government concerning the right of public employees not engaged in the administration of the state to engage in collective bargaining, and particularly: (1) the agreement of 11 September 1999 on basic wages concluded by the Government and the unions of the public administration at a meeting of the joint committee; (2) the "social contract for innovation" of 12 February 2004 concluded by the Government and the unions of the public administration; and (3) the agreement concluded by the Government and the unions of the public administration following a strike by unions in the education sector in 2005. The Committee had concluded that, in practice, there were wage negotiations and agreements in the public sector.

The Committee observes that the Government has sent the text of Ministerial Order No. 12/CAB.MIN/TPS/ar/NK/054 of 12 October 2004, establishing the procedures for the representation and recourse to elections of workers in enterprises or establishments of all types. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that it intends to regulate the salaries of public servants set by negotiated agreements in the context of the imminent reform of the public administration. In this regard, the Committee also notes the comment by the ITUC that the staff of decentralized entities (towns, territories and sectors), who comprise a subcategory of public servant, do not enjoy the right to bargain. The Committee reiterates its previous request to the Government to take steps to ensure that the legislation guarantees the right of collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, as established under Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention, and requests the Government to indicate the developments concerning the reform of the public administration.

Djibouti

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee takes note of the direct contacts mission undertaken in January 2008 following the discussion that had taken place in the Committee on the Application of Standards of the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2007).

The Committee notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008 reiterating its previous observations of 2007 concerning violations of the Convention in law and in practice. The ITUC denounces the brutal repression of strikes, the designation by the authorities of persons who do not represent the most representative organizations for participating in international meetings, and the harassment and arrest of trade unionists. The Committee urges the Government to send its replies to the observations by the ITUC.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it already noted the observations from the ITUC on the arrest and assault of trade unionists and acts of anti-union harassment, and requested the Government to conduct investigations into the allegations. The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report received in May 2008 merely rejects the ITUC's observations and makes some general remarks on freedom of association in Djibouti. The Committee also notes that, according to information gathered by the direct contacts mission which took place in January 2008, a dominant feature of the situation of trade unions in Djibouti is a widening gap between some workers' organizations and the Government, and allegations persist regarding Government interference in union activities and discrimination and harassment suffered by union leaders. Moreover, the Committee notes the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2450 (351st Report, paragraphs 775 to 798). The Committee firmly reminds the Government that civil freedoms and trade union rights are interdependent and that a truly free and independent trade union movement can only develop in a climate of respect for fundamental human rights. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will give priority to resolving all pending issues so that all trade union organizations and their representatives can fully enjoy the guarantees afforded by the Convention. The Committee once again requests the Government to take measures without delay so that the necessary investigations are conducted into the serious allegations referred to above in order to identify the persons responsible for anti-union acts, and to prosecute and penalize them, in accordance with the law.

Legislative problems. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the provisions of Act No. 133/AN/05/5° L of 28 January 2006 issuing the Labour Code. The Act was denounced by the ITUC and also by the Labour Union of Djibouti (UDT) and the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGTD) as challenging fundamental rights relating to freedom of association. The Committee notes that, according to the report of the direct contacts mission, the Government reaffirms that all the social partners were consulted in the process of preparation of the Labour Code. However, the Committee notes that the Government held working meetings with the mission to consider the points of divergence between the national legislation and the Conventions in order to rectify them and that it undertook to bring the recommended solutions to the attention of a tripartite National Council for Labour, Employment and Vocational Training (CNTEFP), which was due to be constituted. The Committee notes that, in its report of May 2008, the Government reiterates its commitment to reviewing certain provisions of the legislation in order to bring them into conformity with the Convention and bring them to the attention of the CNTEFP. In this respect, the Committee notes the warning contained in the report of the direct contacts mission regarding any excessive delay in constituting the CNTEFP and the impact thereof on the adoption of the necessary legislative amendments. It also notes the mission's recommendation that, in a context where the representativeness of workers' organizations has not yet been established in a clear and objective manner, no representation from the trade unions in Djibouti should be discarded from the work of the CNTEFP. The Committee endorses the recommendations of the direct contacts mission on this point and requests the Government to indicate whether the CNTEFP has been constituted and state the composition thereof.

The Committee wishes to remind the Government of its comments concerning the following points of divergence between the Labour Code and the Convention:

- Sections 41 and 42 of the Labour Code. These provisions concern the suspension of employment contracts. Section 41 provides that the employment contract shall be suspended, among other cases, for the duration of any regular, political or trade union office held by the worker which is not compatible with paid employment (paragraph 8). Section 42 provides in addition that the period during which the employment is suspended shall not be counted for the purpose of determining the worker's seniority within the undertaking. The Committee considers that the holding of trade union office is not incompatible with professional life and, consequently, any worker holding trade union office should be able to remain employed. The Committee therefore considers that sections 41 and 42 of the Labour Code, in providing for a more or less automatic suspension of the employment contract when a worker holds trade union office, are likely to be detrimental to the rights of all workers to establish and join the organization of their own choosing or to hold trade union office (Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention). The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend sections 41 and 42 of the Labour Code by providing that the possibility of suspending the employment contract during a period in which a worker holds a trade union office that is incompatible with a professional activity is a matter for negotiation between the employer and the trade union, who must establish the relevant arrangements, and that in any case such suspension cannot be automatic.
- Section 214 of the Labour Code. This section provides that any person convicted "by any court" may not hold office as a trade union leader. The Committee recalls that a law which generally prohibits access to trade union office because of any conviction is incompatible with the principles of freedom of association (Article 3 of the Convention), when the activity condemned is not prejudicial to the attitude and integrity required to exercise trade union office. In this case, the Committee considers that section 214 of the Code, in deeming any person who has been convicted to be unsuitable for trade union office, is formulated too broadly and would cover situations in which the nature of the conviction is not inherently such as to rule out the holding of trade union office. The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend section 214 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that only court convictions for offences which by their nature call into question the integrity of the individual are deemed to be incompatible with the holding of trade union office.
- Section 215 of the Labour Code. This section concerns the formalities for registration and verification of the legality of a trade union. Under the terms of this section, the founders of any occupational trade union are required to deposit their regulations and the list of persons responsible for their administration and management; within a period of 30 days following their deposit, copies of the regulations and the list of persons responsible for the administration and management of the union are transmitted by the labour inspector to the Minister of Labour and the Chief Public Prosecutor; the documents are accompanied by a report prepared by the Labour Inspectorate; the Minister of Labour then has 15 days to issue a receipt granting legal recognition to the union; the Chief Public Prosecutor then has 30 days to verify the regulations and review the situation of each of the officials responsible for the administration and management of the union and to notify the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Labour and the union leaders concerned of his/her conclusions; any modification to the regulations and any changes to the composition of the officials responsible for the management or administration of the trade union have to be brought to the knowledge of the same authorities and are subject to verification under the same conditions. The Committee firstly wishes to remind the Government that Article 2 of the Convention guarantees the right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization by the public authorities. It therefore considers that national legislation which requires the deposit of the regulations of organizations is compatible with this provision if it is a mere formality intended to ensure that the regulations are available to the public. Nevertheless, problems of compatibility with the Convention may arise if the registration procedure is lengthy or complicated, or if the rules concerning registration are applied in such a way as to defeat its purpose and the registration authorities make excessive use of their discretionary power. The Committee notes that section 215 of the Labour Code, under which the decision of the Minister of Labour requires not only the deposit by the founders of the trade union of the relevant documents but also a detailed report by the labour inspector, would appear to grant the administration more or less discretionary power in deciding whether or not an organization meets the registration criteria. This situation could amount in practice to denying the right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization, in contravention of Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend, in consultation with the social partners, section 215 of the Labour Code so as to guarantee the right to establish workers' and employers' organizations without previous authorization, remove the provisions which give de facto discriminatory powers to the administration and ensure that the registration procedure is merely a formality.

Finally, the Committee recalls that its previous comments were also concerned with the need for the Government to repeal or amend the following provisions of the legislation:

- Section 5 of the Act on associations. This provision, which requires organizations to obtain authorization prior to their establishment as trade unions, is contrary to Article 2 of the Convention.
- Section 23 of Decree No. 83-099/PR/FP of 10 September 1983. This provision, which confers upon the President of the Republic broad powers to requisition public servants who are indispensable to the life of the nation and the proper operation of essential public services, should be amended in order to restrict the power of requisition to public servants who exercise authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term.

Noting that the Government displayed a degree of openness during the direct contacts mission by indicating that it was planning a number of amendments and declaring its willingness to receive technical assistance and advice from the Office, the Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary steps as soon as possible to revise and amend the legislative provisions, taking into account the comments reiterated above. It expresses the firm hope that the Government's next report will contain information on the progress made in this respect.

A request on a number of other points is being addressed directly to the Government.

Equatorial Guinea

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. The Committee also notes that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards regretted that it was unable to examine the case of the application of the Convention by Equatorial Guinea owing to the fact that the Government was not represented at the Conference.

The Committee also notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008, which refer once again to the legislative issues which are under examination and the administrative authority's refusal to register a number of trade unions, including the Trade Union of Workers of Equatorial Guinea (UST), the Independent Services Union (SIS), the Teachers' Trade Union Association (ASD) and the Agricultural Workers' Organization (OTC). The Committee once again urges the Government to register without delay the trade union organizations, whose registration was refused and inform it of the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that workers are able to establish organizations of their choosing.

The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been requesting the Government to:

- amend section 5 of Act No. 12/1992, which provides that employees' organizations may be occupational or sectoral – so that workers may, if they so desire, establish enterprise trade unions;
- amend section 10 of Act No. 12/1992, which provides that for an occupational association to obtain legal personality it must, inter alia, have a minimum of 50 employees in order to reduce the number of workers required to a reasonable level;

- confirm that, as a result of a revision of the Fundamental Act in 1995 (Act No. 1 of 1995), the right to strike is recognized in public utilities and is exercised under the conditions laid down by law;
- provide information on the services deemed to be essential, and on how the minimum services to be ensured are determined, as provided for in section 37 of Act No. 12/1992; and
- state whether public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State enjoy the right to strike (section 58 of the Fundamental Act).

The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation in order to bring it into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will send a detailed report next year for examination by the Committee in the context of the regular reporting cycle and that it will contain full information on the issues raised.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take all possible steps without delay to renew the constructive dialogue with the ILO. Furthermore, taking into account the gravity of the situation, it urges the Government to seek technical assistance from the Office to ensure the full application of the Convention.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with regret that it has not received the Government's report. The Committee also notes that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards regretted not being able to examine the case of the application of the Convention by Equatorial Guinea due to the fact that the Government was not represented at the Conference.

Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2008, to the effect that there is no provision protecting workers against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee observes nevertheless that Act No. 12/1992 establishes protection against such acts.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. The Committee notes that the comments made by the ITUC refer once again to the impossibility of establishing any trade union organization which the authority considers to be "too independent". In 2004, the Government pointed out in its report that there were no trade unions in the country due to a lack of trade union tradition. The Committee emphasizes once again that the existence of trade unions established freely by workers is a prerequisite for the application of the Convention and for exercising the right to collective bargaining. The Committee urges the Government to adopt without delay the necessary measures to create appropriate conditions for the establishment of trade unions which can engage in collective bargaining with a view to regulating conditions of employment.

The Committee also recalls that in its previous observation it noted that section 6 of Act No. 12/1992 on trade unions and collective labour relations provides that the organization of officials of the public administration shall be regulated by a special Act and that the Act had not yet been adopted. The Committee requests the Government once again to indicate whether the special Act has been adopted and ensures public officials' right to organize, and to provide detailed information on the application of the Convention with regard to public officials who are not engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee hopes that the Government will send a detailed report for examination next year in the context of the regular reporting cycle, and that this report will contain full information on the matters raised.

Finally, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take all the measures within its power, without delay, to renew constructive dialogue with the ILO. Furthermore, it urges the Government to seek technical assistance from the Office to ensure full application of the Convention.

Estonia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1994)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008, which refers to the matters already raised by the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee recalls that for a number of years it had been raising the issue of the prohibition of the right to strike in the public service (section 21(1) of the Collective Labour Dispute Resolution Act). In this respect, the Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2543 concerning the same issue.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that while there have been no amendments to the current legislation, the Ministry of Justice has prepared a concept of modernization of public service, which provides a new and narrower definition of the term "public servant" to include only those employees who exercise authority on behalf of the State. The Committee notes this information and requests the Government to inform it of the progress achieved in respect of the adoption of legislative provisions ensuring that public servants, who do not exercise authority in the name of the State, enjoy the right to strike.

The Committee, once again, requests the Government to provide the list of services where the right to strike will be restricted, as referred to in section 21(3) and (4) of the Collective Labour Dispute Resolution Act.

Ethiopia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008, which are being translated and will be examined in the framework of the next reporting cycle.

The Committee regrets that the Government's report contains no observations on the comments previously submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC), the Education International (EI) and the ITUC alleging serious violations of teachers' trade union rights and, in particular, of the Ethiopian Teachers' Association (ETA). The Committee expresses deep concern over the failure of the Government to conduct a full and independent inquiry into the allegations made relating to arrests of trade unionists, their torture and mistreatment when in detention, and continuing intimidation and interference. The Committee recalls that when disorders have occurred involving loss of human life or serious injuries, the setting up of an independent judicial inquiry is a particularly appropriate method of fully ascertaining the facts, determining responsibilities, punishing those responsible and preventing the repetition of such actions. Judicial inquiries of this kind should be conducted as promptly and speedily as possible, since otherwise there is a risk of de facto impunity which reinforces the climate of violence and insecurity and which is therefore highly detrimental to the exercise of trade union activities (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 29). The Committee urges the Government to conduct a full and independent inquiry without delay into all of the comments made by the ITUC and earlier by the ICFTU and EI and to provide information on the outcome.

The Committee notes that a direct contact mission visited the country in October 2008 and notes the information contained in the mission report. In particular, the Committee notes that the Supreme Court has rendered its final decision concerning the ETA executive body and that following this decision, a group of teachers have made a request to the Ministry of Justice to be registered under the name of the National Association of Ethiopian Teachers. The Committee observes from the mission report that despite the fact that this request was made in August 2008, no answer concerning registration has been received from the Ministry so far. The Committee further notes that the Ministry of Justice requested the Ministry of Education to provide its opinion as to whether the new teachers' association should be registered. In this respect, the Committee considers that a request to the Ministry of Education, which is the employer in this case, concerning the appropriateness of registering an association of teachers is contrary to the right of workers to form and join the organization of their own choosing without previous authorization. The Committee further expresses its concern that four months have elapsed since the teachers' request without registration being granted by the Ministry of Justice. The Committee expresses particular concern and regret over the fact that the delay in registration occurs within the context of the long-standing allegations of serious violations of teachers' trade union rights including the continuous interference by way of threats, dismissals, arrest, detention and maltreatment of ETA members, which are pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 2516). The Committee urges the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure the rapid resolution of this request for registration so that teachers may fully exercise their right to form organizations for the furthering and defending teachers' occupational interests without further delay.

The Committee recalls that it had previously noted the Government's indication that it was in the process of revision of the Civil Servant Proclamation, which would protect and guarantee the right of civil servants, including teachers in public schools, to form and join trade unions. The Committee regrets that no information was provided by the Government on the progress made in this respect. In the light of the above, the Committee urges the Government to amend the Civil Servant Proclamation without further delay so as to ensure that the rights of civil servants (including teachers) afforded by the Convention are fully guaranteed. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this respect.

The Committee recalls that for several years it had been expressing its concern over the Labour Proclamation (2003), which falls short of ensuring full application of Convention No. 87. In particular, the Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government:

- to ensure the right to organize of the following categories of workers excluded, by section 3, from the scope of application of the Labour Proclamation: workers whose employment relations arise out of a contract concluded for the purpose of upbringing, treatment, care, rehabilitation, education, training (other than apprenticeship); contract of personal service for non-profit-making purposes; managerial employees, as well as employees of state administration; judges and prosecutors, who were governed by special laws;

- to delete air transport and urban bus services from the list of essential services in which strike action is prohibited (section 136(2)). In this respect, considering that these services did not constitute essential services in the strict sense of the term, the Committee had suggested that the Government gave consideration to the establishment of a negotiated system of minimum service in these services of public utility, rather than imposing an outright ban on strikes, which should be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term;
- to amend its legislation so as to ensure that, except in situations concerning essential services in the strict sense of the term, acute national crisis and public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, recourse to arbitration is allowed only upon the request of both parties. In this respect, the Committee had noted that section 143(2) of the Labour Proclamation allowed the aggrieved party to the labour dispute to take the case to the Labour Relations Board for arbitration or to the appropriate court. In this case, the strike was considered unlawful (section 160(1)). In the case of essential services, as listed in section 136(2), the dispute was referred to an ad hoc board for arbitration (section 144(2));
- to amend section 158(3), according to which the strike vote should be taken by the majority of the workers concerned in a meeting in which at least two-thirds of the members of the trade union were present, so as to lower the quorum required for a strike ballot; and
- to ensure that the provisions of the Labour Proclamation, which, as noted above, contrary to the Convention, restrict the right of workers to organize their activities, are not invoked to cancel an organization's registration pursuant to section 120(c) until they have been brought into conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Labour Proclamation is being examined with a view to amendment. In this regard, the Government indicates that employment relations arising out of a contract concluded for the purpose of upbringing, treatment, care, rehabilitation, education, training (other than apprenticeship), contract of personal service for non-profit-making purposes, as well as of managerial employees are the issues to be discussed by the labour proclamation drafting committee. The Government further indicates that the Committee's observations on essential services, compulsory arbitration, the need to lower the strike quorum required for a strike ballot, as well as the matter of dissolution of trade unions are also to be discussed by the drafting committee. The Committee expects that the Labour Proclamation will be soon amended so as to ensure its full conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to indicate any progress made in this respect.

The Committee further requests, once again, the Government to indicate how the right to organize of employees of state administration, judges and prosecutors is ensured in law and in practice and to transmit with its next report any specific legislation in this respect.

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008, which are being translated and will be examined in the framework of the next reporting cycle.

The Committee regrets that no observation was provided by the Government on the previous comments submitted by the ITUC and Education International (EI) concerning specific violations of the Convention regarding teachers' trade union rights in the public sector, including interference in trade union activities of the Ethiopian Teachers' Association (ETA) by way of creation and control by the Government of a teachers' trade union, and the harassment of teachers (dismissals, transfers, etc.) in connection with their union affiliation. The Committee recalls that governments should refrain from interference in the establishment and functioning of trade unions. The Committee urges the Government to conduct a full and independent inquiry without delay into all of the allegations made by the ITUC and EI and to indicate its outcome.

The Committee had previously noted that the national legislation, in particular the Labour Proclamation (2003), provided inadequate protection of the rights afforded by the Convention and expressed the following concerns.

- Scope of application of the Convention. According to its section 3, the Labour Proclamation was not applicable to the employment relations arising out of a contract concluded for the purpose of upbringing, treatment, care of rehabilitation, education, training (other than apprenticeship), contract of personal service for non-profit-making purposes and managerial employees. The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the categories of worker excluded from the scope of the Labour Proclamation enjoy the rights under the Convention, either by amending the Labour Proclamation or by adopting specific legislative provisions.
- Absence of adequate protection against acts of interference. The Committee had requested the Government to amend its legislation by adopting specific provisions coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, providing for protection of organizations of employers and workers against acts of interference by each other's agents or members in their establishment, functioning or administration so as to give full effect to Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention.
- Article 4. Collective bargaining. The Committee had requested the Government to amend section 130(6) of the Labour Proclamation, as amended by Proclamation No. 494/2006, providing that, if the negotiation to modify or replace a collective agreement is not finalized within three months from the expiry date of the collective agreement, the provisions of the collective agreement relating to wages and other benefits shall cease to be effective. The Committee considered that this provision did not take into account the reasons behind a failure to finalize a new agreement nor the eventual responsibility of one or the other party for this failure and was not conducive to promoting collective bargaining. The Committee also considered that it was up to the parties to decide on the moment when the collective agreement becomes inapplicable after the date of its expiration.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the above comments with regard to the application of the Convention to the employment relations arising out of a contract concluded for the purpose of upbringing, treatment, care, rehabilitation, education, training (other than apprenticeship), contract of personal service for non-profit-making purposes were on the agenda to be discussed by the Ethiopian labour law reform committee. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the discussion will be extended to the Committee's observation on protection to be granted to workers' and employers' organizations against acts of interference committed by each other's agents, as well as on Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee expects that the Labour Proclamation will be amended without delay so as to ensure its full conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to indicate progress made in this respect. The Committee further requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the rights under the Convention of managerial employees.

The Committee recalls that it had previously taken note of article 4 of the draft regulation concerning employment relations established by religious or charity organizations, which provided that "religious or charity organizations employing persons for administrative or charity work shall not be obliged to enter into collective bargaining concerning salary increment, fringe benefits, bonus and similar other benefits which may incur financial expense upon the organization". Recalling that collective bargaining should be promoted also in respect of these categories of worker and that no restrictions on the scope of bargaining should be imposed on workers by religious or charity institutions, the Committee had requested the Government to bring this draft into conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft regulation has already been presented at the consultative meeting with the persons concerned and it was decided that the draft regulation should be replaced with a new draft regulation. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard. It further requests the Government to transmit a copy of the bill once it has been drafted.

Articles 4 and 6. The Committee once again urges the Government to amend the Civil Servant Proclamation so as to ensure the right of civil servants, including public teachers, to defend their occupational interests through collective bargaining. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

France

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1951)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the detailed information supplied in response to the observations made by the General Confederation of Labour-Force ouvrière (CGT-FO) concerning the Act on social dialogue and continuity of the public service in scheduled land passenger transport of 21 August 2007 (Act No. 2007-1224).

In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under the terms of section 5 of this Act, transport enterprises, the employer and the representative trade unions had to engage in bargaining with a view to the conclusion, before 1 January 2008, of a collective agreement on the service to be provided in the event of disruption of traffic or a strike. This provision also established that, in the absence of an applicable agreement as of 1 January 2008, a plan of the services to be provided had to be determined by the employer. The Committee recalled the principle according to which the determination of a negotiated minimum service should be limited to the operations that are strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population or the minimum requirements of the service, as it restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests. The Committee also emphasized that workers' organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining the minimum service, along with the employers and the public authorities. Finally, the Committee recalled that, in the event of disagreement, the parties might also envisage the establishment of a joint or independent body (or recourse to a judicial body by mutual consent) responsible for examining rapidly and without formalities the difficulties raised by the definition and application of such a minimum service and empowered to issue enforceable decisions (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 161).

The Committee notes that the Government recalls in its reply dated 28 August 2008 that the purpose of the adopted Act is to reconcile the exercise of the right to strike with other fundamental freedoms, and that it places the social partners at the focus of the measures to be adopted in order to ensure the best coordination possible. The Government points out that the Act does not intend to establish a minimum service which would lead to the requisitioning of staff but aims to set up a system for predicting the services to be provided which makes no difference to the capacity of the strike to have an impact and apply pressure. With regard to the participation of the social partners in the mechanisms for dispute prevention and organization in the event of a strike, the Government indicates that agreements have been signed with trade unions in both the enterprises and the occupational sector concerned (for example, the agreement signed on 21 January 2008 in urban passenger transport, the extension of which making it applicable to 170 enterprises belonging to the Public Transport Union was published in the Official Journal of 15 June 2008). As regards the procedures for resolving disputes, the Government adds that national law offers a wide range of possibilities but in the transport sector there is also room for cooperation and regulation, as show by the branch negotiations which are already placed under the authority of the chairman of a joint committee, which is independent of the parties, and the task of which is to facilitate dialogue. Furthermore, within the passenger transport enterprises (RATP and SNCF), additional “social alert” clauses were signed before the 1 January 2008 deadline with five trade unions in order to ensure conformity with the provisions of the Act of 21 August 2007. According to the Government, which bases its statements on the annual statistics of the SNCF, the use of “social alert” mechanisms has more than doubled without any increase in the number of strike notices deposited; on the contrary, the number of notices leading to strikes has increased over the same period. This suggests that the periods of prior negotiation provided for by the Act do not restrict the possibility of going on strike. Finally, with regard to the possible use of a joint or independent body, the Government indicates that the setting up of such a body has not been considered necessary by the Government, Parliament or the social partners, in view of existing mechanisms. The Government also recalls that the possibility of intervention by a neutral third party to promote an amicable resolution of disputes is possible under the terms of section 6 of the Act, which provides for the appointment of a mediator by the parties. The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government.

The Committee trusts that the Government will ensure, in any dispute in the land passenger transport sector and in the absence of an agreement on the determination of the minimum service to be maintained in the event of a strike, that the principle is observed whereby the workers’ organizations concerned shall be able to participate, alongside the employers and the public authorities, in the definition of this minimum service and, in the event of disagreement, the possibility is guaranteed for the parties to have recourse to a joint or independent body, according to existing or specially established mechanisms.

The Committee is also addressing a request on a number of other points directly to the Government.

Gambia

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Scope of the Convention. The Committee notes that Labour Act No. 12 of 1990 (the Act) does not apply to workers engaged in civil service, prison service and domestic service. The Committee notes that according to the Government the new labour bill empowers the Secretary of State to extend the scope of the bill to cover any category of worker excluded. While recalling that only the armed forces, the police and public servants engaged in the administration of the State can be excluded from the guarantees of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to guarantee that the rights afforded by the Convention are ensured for the abovementioned categories of worker.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee had noted that section 75 of the Act provides that any term or condition in a contract of employment, whether express or implied, prohibiting an employee from becoming or remaining a member of any trade union, or purporting to subject the employee to any penalty, loss of benefit or detriment by reason of such membership, shall be null and void. However, according to section 73(1), not all workers are entitled to a written contract of employment, this type of contract being reserved to specific cases of employment, in particular, fixed-term employment of six months or more. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the way in which workers are guaranteed protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in cases where the employment relationship is not based on a written contract of employment.

The Committee had noted that Part IX, sections 109–125 of the Bill by which the Act was introduced to Parliament contained provisions on protection against dismissal by reason of union membership or because of participation in trade union activities, including strikes, and provided for compensation and reinstatement as remedies for such acts. However, the corresponding provisions are missing from the copy of the Labour Act adopted by Parliament, which the Committee has at its disposal. The Committee therefore requests the Government to transmit a complete copy of the Act.

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee had noted that there is no provision in the Act concerning protection against acts of interference by workers’ and employers’ organizations (or their agents) in each other’s affairs. The Committee notes that according to the Government the new labour bill provides protection against acts of interference. The Committee requests the Government to communicate the text of any provisions of the new labour bill that prohibit acts of interference (such as the establishment or financial support of workers’ organizations with the object of placing them under the control of employers or employers’ organizations) and guarantee sufficiently rapid appeal procedures and dissuasive sanctions against such acts.

Article 4. Measures to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or their organizations and workers’ organizations. The Committee had observed that section 161 of the Act provides that voluntary agreements may be registered by the Commissioner upon the application of both parties to the agreement. Noting that the wording of this section seems to allow discretionary power to deny registration, the Committee recalls that the registration of the collective agreement can be refused only if it has a procedural flaw or does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by general labour law. The Committee notes that according to the Government the new labour bill does not give discretionary power to the Commissioner. It requests the Government to transmit a copy of the relevant provisions.

The Committee had noted that, according to section 168, in order to be recognized as a sole bargaining agent, a trade union must be registered as “efficient”, within the meaning of sections 128(5) and 142 of the Act (i.e. the Registrar should be satisfied that the trade union is and is likely to remain independent and is capable of efficiently representing its members and conducting the trade union affairs). Considering that provisions which allow such great discretionary power to the Registrar are contrary to the principle of the autonomy of the parties in collective bargaining and therefore are not in conformity with the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to repeal or amend sections 128(5), 142 and 168, accordingly.

The Committee also noted that, according to section 168, in order to be recognized as a sole bargaining agent, a trade union should represent a certain percentage of employees under a contract of service (30 per cent in the case of a single union and at least 45 per cent if the establishment in question employs at least 100 people; in this case, the bargaining agent could be composed of two or more trade unions). The Committee recalls that where, under a system for nominating an exclusive bargaining agent, there is no union representing the required percentage to be so designated, collective bargaining rights should not be denied to other unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members and requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee further noted that section 168(6) provides that an employer may, if he or she wishes, organize a secret ballot upon receiving an application to establish a sole bargaining agent. The Committee considers that the organization of a ballot for determining representativeness should be carried out by the authorities or an independent party upon a request presented by a union. While taking note of the Government's statement according to which the appropriate authorities will be informed of the Committee's comments in order to make the necessary changes, the Committee requests the Government to amend section 168(6) in accordance with the above.

The Committee had noted that, under section 167, a work committee could be set up at an establishment where at least 100 employees are employed. The Committee notes that the Government has communicated the text of the relevant provisions of the new labour bill. The Committee requests the Government to clarify the role of such committees and more specifically to indicate: (1) whether trade union representatives can be elected to such committees; and (2) whether these committees can negotiate and conclude collective agreements even when a union exists in the undertaking.

Article 6. The Committee had requested the Government to indicate whether public servants not engaged in the administration of the State are granted collective bargaining rights and to specify the relevant legislative provisions. The Committee notes that these categories of worker do not have the right to form unions and therefore do not have the right to collective bargaining. The Committee notes that according to the Government the relevant authorities will be advised to grant the right to collective bargaining to civil servants in the new labour bill.

The Committee trusts that the Government will take all necessary steps to bring its national law into conformity with the Convention and requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged in this respect, in particular those concerning the adoption of the new labour bill.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Ghana

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It further notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication of 29 August 2008; the ITUC's comments primarily refer to legislative matters previously raised by the Committee.

Prison staff. Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary legislative measures to ensure that prison service staff enjoy the right to organize and bargain collectively. The Committee notes the Government's statement that this request has been communicated to the Sector Minister for due consideration. Recalling that the Convention's guarantees apply to prison service staff, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Labour Act, so as to ensure that prison service staff expressly enjoy the right to organize and to collective bargaining, and to provide information on developments in this regard.

Collective bargaining certification. The Committee had previously noted that sections 99–100 of the Labour Act, 2003, regulate the issue of trade union recognition for collective bargaining purposes by providing that the Chief Labour Officer shall issue, upon request by a trade union, a certificate appointing that trade union as the appropriate representative to conduct negotiations on behalf of the class of workers specified in the collective bargaining certificate (section 99). Further noting that under section 99(4), the Chief Labour Officer appeared to have full discretion to decide which trade union to grant recognition to, in situations where more than one trade union existed at the work place, and that the criteria upon which this decision should be based were not specified, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on any regulations adopted or envisaged under section 99 of the Labour Act with a view to setting up procedures and criteria relevant to the Chief Labour Officer's competence to determine which union shall hold a collective bargaining certificate.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government provides no indications in respect of the abovementioned relevant criteria, but rather limits itself to repeating the provisions of section 99 of the Labour Act, 2003. In these circumstances, the Committee once again recalls that in cases in which a system of "compulsory" recognition has been established, where the employer must recognize the existing trade union(s) under certain conditions, it is important for the determination of the trade union in question to be based on objective and pre-established criteria so as to avoid any opportunity for partiality or abuse. Furthermore, when national legislation provides for a compulsory procedure for recognizing unions as exclusive bargaining agents, certain safeguards should be attached, such as: (a) the certification to be made by an independent body; (b) the representative organization to be chosen by a majority vote of the employees in the unit concerned; (c) the right of an organization, which in a previous trade union election failed to secure a sufficiently large number of votes, to request a new election after a stipulated period; and (d) the right of any new organization other than the certified organization to demand a new election after a reasonable period has elapsed (see the General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 240). The Committee requests the Government to take measures to adopt the appropriate regulations establishing procedures and objective criteria concerning the Chief Labour Officer's competence to determine which union shall hold a collective bargaining certificate, in keeping with the abovementioned principle, and to provide information on developments in this regard.

Guatemala

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the Government's report, the discussion which took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2008 and the various cases currently before the Committee on Freedom of Association (some of which relate to serious allegations of violence against trade union leaders and trade unionists). The Committee also notes the report of the high-level mission which visited the country in April 2008 and the tripartite agreement signed during the mission designed to improve the application of the Convention.

The Committee also notes the detailed comments on the application of the Convention made by the Union Movement, Guatemalan Indigenous and Agricultural Workers for the Defence of Workers' Rights in a communication dated 31 August 2008, as well as the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008, which refer to matters already raised by the Committee, as well as to serious acts of violence against trade union leaders and trade unionists, impediments to the registration of trade union organizations, difficulties in exercising the right of assembly of trade union organizations and other violations of the Convention. In this regard, the Committee hopes that, in the context of the tripartite agreement concluded during the high-level mission, all the questions raised, as well as the comments made by the ITUC in 2005 and by the Trade Union Confederation of Guatemala (UNSITRAGUA) in 2006, will be examined and tackled in a tripartite manner by the Government and the social partners in the context of the work of the Tripartite Committee on International Affairs, the Legal Reform Subcommittee and the mechanism for rapid intervention in cases.

Acts of violence against trade unionists

The Committee recalls that for several years, it has noted in its observations acts of violence against trade unionists and has previously requested the Government to provide information on developments in this regard. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that: (1) it shares the Committee's concern with regard to the acts of violence which, in its view, affect not only people involved in trade union activities, but also society in general; (2) it hopes that, in the medium term, it will be possible to reduce the crime rate through the development of strategies to strengthen civil intelligence systems, so that the perpetrators of crimes can be identified, tried and convicted; (3) a new Attorney-General and Head of the Office of the Public Prosecutor has recently taken up office and the Tripartite Committee on International Affairs has called on him to deal with the issue of acts of violence against trade unionists and the need to track down, prosecute and convict the perpetrators of these acts; and (4) the intention of the members of the Tripartite Committee is to achieve closely coordinated links with the Office of the Public Prosecutor in order to facilitate the provision of effective security measures for those members of the trade union movement who are the victims of intimidation or threats.

The Committee notes the conclusions of the high-level mission, in particular, with reference to the issue of human rights in trade union circles, that: "the mission noted greater attention to this problem, which is reflected in the decision of the Office of the Public Prosecutor under the instruction of the Attorney-General to allocate greater budgetary resources to the Special Office for Offences against Journalists and Trade Unionists and to assign four new investigators to that area. Moreover, the progress that had been made in the investigation into the assassination of the Secretary-General of the Trade Union of Workers of Puerto Quetzal, Mr Pedro Zamora, in January 2007, which prompted a special ILO mission and action taken by the mission in March–April 2007. The investigations carried out have established that two individuals have been accused of the crime and a warrant for their arrest has been issued. It is also worth pointing out that, following an investigation, it was confirmed that the trade unionist Mr López Estrada, thought to have disappeared, was found safe and sound at his mother's house in Puerto Barrios".

Furthermore, the Committee notes that, at the proposal of the mission, the Tripartite Committee approved an agreement to eradicate violence, which provides for the carrying out of: "(1) an evaluation of institutional action, including the most recent, and particularly the special protection measures to prevent acts of violence against trade unionists under threat; and (2) an evaluation of the measures that are being taken (increases in budget allocations and in the number of investigators) to guarantee effective investigation with sufficient resources to permit the elucidation of the crimes against trade unionists and the identification of those responsible".

In this respect, the Committee once again expresses deep concern at the acts of violence against trade union leaders and members and recalls that trade union rights can only be exercised in a climate that is free of violence. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will continue to take measures to guarantee full respect for the human rights of trade unionists and will continue providing protection measures to all trade unionists who so request. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to conduct the investigations with a view to identifying those responsible for acts of violence against trade union leaders and members, so that they are prosecuted and penalized in accordance with the law. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any development in this respect.

Legislative problems

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on the following provisions which raise problems of conformity with the Convention:

- restrictions on the establishment of organizations in full freedom (the need to have half plus one of those working in the occupation to establish industry trade unions, under section 215(c) of the Labour Code); delays in the registration of trade unions or refusal to register them. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (1) the new Ministry of Labour authorities have initiated a process to significantly reduce the time required for the administrative processing of trade union authorizations; (2) the Directorate General of Labour had authorized 40 new trade unions as at August 2008; and (3) the speed with which pending applications for registration will be processed is dependent on how quickly the comments made by the technical bodies of the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance to the representatives of the trade unions in the process of being established are taken into account;
- restrictions on the right to elect trade union leaders in full freedom (the need to be of Guatemalan origin and to be a worker in the enterprise or economic activity in order to be elected as trade union leader, under sections 220 and 223 of the Labour Code);
- restrictions on the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities freely (under section 241 of the Labour Code, strikes are declared not by a majority of those casting votes, but by a majority of the workers); the possibility of imposing compulsory arbitration in the event of a dispute in the public transport sector and in services related to fuel, and the need to determine whether strikes for the purpose of inter-union solidarity are still prohibited (section 4(d), (e) and (g) of Decree No. 71-86, as amended by Legislative Decree No. 35-96 of 27 March 1996); labour, civil and penal sanctions applicable to strikes involving public servants or workers in specified enterprises (sections 390(2) and 430 of the Penal Code and Decree No. 71-86);
- Civil Service Bill. In its previous observation, the Committee noted a Civil Service Bill which, according to the UNSITRAGUA and the National Federation of State Workers' Unions (FENASTEG), requires a percentage that is too high to establish unions and restricts the right to strike. The Committee notes that the Government reports that the Bill has been withdrawn from discussion, since an inter-sectoral consultation committee was set up in July 2008 to come up with a Bill that is consistent with the needs of the sectors involved;
- Situation of many workers in the public sector who do not benefit from trade union rights. These workers (who are under contracts under item 029 and others of the budget), who should have been recruited for specific or temporary tasks, are engaged in ordinary and permanent functions and often do not benefit from trade union rights and other employment benefits apart from wages, and are not covered by the social security nor by collective bargaining where it exists. The Committee notes that the members of the Supreme Court of Justice stated to the high-level mission that, in accordance with case law, these workers enjoy the right to organize.

With regard to the matters above, the Committee notes that, at the proposal of the high-level mission, the Tripartite Committee approved an agreement to modernize the legislation and give better effect to Conventions Nos 87 and 98, and that this agreement provides for "an examination of the dysfunctions of the current system of labour relations (excessive delays and procedural abuses, lack of effective enforcement of the law and of sentences, etc.) and particularly of the machinery for the protection of the right to collective bargaining and the rights of workers' and employers' organizations and their members as laid down in Conventions Nos 87 and 98 in the light of technical considerations and the comments of a substantive and procedural nature of the ILO Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations". The Committee observes that the high-level mission undertook to provide appropriate technical assistance in relation to these matters and notes with interest that this assistance has already started.

The Committee takes note of the report of the first mission of the technical assistance (November 2008), which was a follow-up to the high-level mission (April 2008).

The Committee firmly hopes that with the technical assistance the Government is receiving, the Government will be able to provide information in its next report on a positive assessment with regard to the various points mentioned.

Other matters

Export processing sector. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the comments made by trade union organizations referring to significant problems relating to trade union rights in export processing zones and requested the Government to take the necessary measures to give full effect to the Convention in export processing zones. The Committee notes that the Government reports that: (1) through its general labour inspectorate, the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance has been addressing complaints made in connection with the export processing sector, as well as developing routine inspections through the Inspectorate's Export Processing Inspection Unit; (2) in 2007, 19 enterprises in the sector closed and in 2008, ten closed; (3) in 2008, a procedure of administrative conciliation allowed the payment of benefits to workers affected by the closures in the case of ten export processing enterprises, and the workers who decided not to make use of the conciliation procedure and opted instead to take legal action received assistance free of charge from the Office of the Labour Ombudsperson; (4) there are ten trade unions in the sector with a total membership of 258 workers; (5) in 2007, ten complaints were dealt with relating to violations of freedom of association rights and in six cases a settlement was reached through conciliation, and in 2008, 17 complaints were dealt with relating to violations of Convention No. 87, and 16 are being processed; and (6) the training activities will continue on the rights established in Conventions Nos 87 and 98 for the export processing sector, for which the Government is counting on technical support from the ILO.

In this regard, the Committee notes that, in its conclusions, the high-level mission points out the following on this matter: "... it is in this area, as well as in the area described in the previous paragraph, that we see the extent to which the problems identified during the 2007 mission persist. According to the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance, there are seven collective agreements for the export processing sector, but only two of those are from 2007. The others date back to 2003 or earlier. With regard to trade union membership, according to the administrative authority, there are six trade unions with a total membership of 562 workers in the export processing sector, among almost 200,000 workers, but according to the executive board of the trade union movement, there are only two trade unions in this sector. Regardless of whichever information is accurate, what is certain is that there continues to be minimal trade union activity and collective bargaining in the export processing sector and problems in applying Conventions Nos 87 and 98".

Under these circumstances, the Committee hopes that the Government will continue benefiting from technical assistance from the Office so that the Convention is given full effect in the export processing sector, and will continue providing information on this matter.

Tripartite national committee. In its previous observation, the Committee asked the Government to continue keeping it informed of the work of the Tripartite Committee on International Affairs, as well as the work of the Legal Reform Subcommittee and the mechanism for rapid intervention in cases. The Committee notes that the Government reports that: (1) it is satisfied with the development of the meetings of the Tripartite Committee, particularly with the effectiveness of the dialogue and the openness to analysis, discussion and recommendations arising from the meetings; (2) by August 2008, ten meetings had been held, in which subjects of relevance to employer-worker relations were discussed; (3) the impetus of the Tripartite Committee's activities has absorbed functions covered by the Legal Reform Subcommittee and an analysis is currently being carried out in order to filter and prioritize the cases to be dealt with; (4) in the context of the mechanism for rapid intervention in cases, both the worker and the employer sectors of the Tripartite Committee have reported cases and, given the constant participation of the general labour inspector, those cases have been dealt with and results achieved, both in the agricultural sector and in the garment or export processing sector; and (5) in addition, the Deputy Minister of Labour has intervened directly in the cases brought to the attention of the Tripartite Committee, appearing in person in the places in which a dispute has arisen and mediating in order to find an appropriate solution to those cases. The Committee requests the Government to continue keeping it informed of the work of the Tripartite Committee on International Affairs, as well as that of the Legal Reform Subcommittee and the mechanism for rapid intervention in cases.

Finally, the Committee observes that, in the context of the session of the International Labour Conference held in 2008, during the analysis of the application of the Convention by Guatemala, the Committee on the Application of Standards invited the Government to accept a mission made up of the Employer and Worker spokespersons to assist the Government in finding durable solutions to all of the above matters. The Committee notes with interest that the Government indicates in its report that it welcomes the invitation along with each and every mission which wishes, in good faith, to assist in overcoming the complex situations relating to freedom of association.

The Committee hopes that it will be able to note in the near future that significant progress has been made in the application of the Convention.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the report of the high-level mission which visited the country in April 2008 and the tripartite agreement signed during the mission with a view to improving the application of the Convention.

The Committee also notes the detailed comments on the application of the Convention made by the Indigenous and Rural Workers Trade Union Movement of Guatemala in a communication dated 31 August 2008, and by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to matters already raised by the Committee, as well as to acts of anti-union discrimination and interference by employers, obstacles to collective bargaining processes and the violation of collective agreements. In this respect, the Committee hopes that, in the context of the tripartite agreement concluded during the high-level mission, all of the issues raised will be examined and addressed in a tripartite manner by the Government and the social partners with the technical assistance of the ILO in the context of the work of the Tripartite Commission on International Labour Affairs, and the Subcommittee for Legal Reform and Rapid Intervention Machinery.

The Committee recalls that for various years it has been referring to the following problems relating to restrictions on the exercise of trade union rights in practice;

- failure to comply with orders for the reinstatement of dismissed trade unionists;
- slowness and ineffectiveness of procedures to impose penalties for breaches of labour legislation;
- need to promote collective bargaining, especially in export processing zones;
- need for the Code of Labour Procedures to be subject to in-depth consultation with the most representative organizations of workers and employers; and
- the Bill on civil service reform. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report under Convention No. 87 that the Bill has been delayed, but that in July 2008 an intersectoral dialogue forum was established with a view to obtaining a bill that is adapted to the specific needs of the sectors concerned.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the matters raised by the Committee have been discussed for several years by the National Tripartite Commission and that tripartite consensus has been achieved on certain issues.

Furthermore, in relation to these matters, the Committee notes that, under the auspices of the high-level mission, the Tripartite Commission concluded an agreement to modernize the legislation and give better effect to Conventions Nos 87 and 98, with the agreement calling for an examination to be carried out of the dysfunctions of the current labour relations system (excessive delays and procedural abuses, lack of effective application of the law and of penalties, etc.), and in particular of the machinery for the protection of the right to collective bargaining and the rights of workers' and employers' organizations and their members set forth in Conventions Nos 87 and 98 in the light of the technical considerations and substantive and procedural comments of the Committee of Experts. The Committee observes that the high-level mission undertook to organize appropriate technical assistance on these matters and notes with interest that this assistance is being provided.

The Committee has received the report of the first technical assistance mission (November 2008) following the high-level mission (April 2008). The Committee firmly hopes that the Government, with the technical assistance it is receiving, will be in a position to provide information in its next report on the progress made in relation to the various issues raised above.

Finally, the Committee observes that, at the session of the International Labour Conference in 2008, when examining the application of Convention No. 87 by Guatemala, the Committee on the Application of Standards invited the Government to accept a mission made up of the Employer and Worker spokespersons to assist the Government in finding durable solutions to all of the above matters. The Committee of Experts appreciates the Government's acceptance of the above invitation and its indication that each and every good faith mission that wished to help in overcoming the complex situations relating to freedom of association was welcome.

The Committee will examine these matters in its next examination of the application of the Convention in the light of the report of the above mission.

Guinea

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes with regret that it has not received the Government's report. It also notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2008, which relate to matters already raised by the Committee. Furthermore, the ITUC reports assaults, by the security forces, on demonstrators and strikers, as a result of which around 40 people died and nearly 300 others were injured, arrests of trade unionists and the destruction of the headquarters of the National Confederation of Workers of Guinea (CNTG). The Committee recalls that a climate of violence in which murders and disappearances of trade union leaders go unpunished, constitutes a serious obstacle to the exercise of trade union rights and that such acts require severe measures to be taken by the authorities. When disorders have occurred involving loss of human life or serious injury, the setting up of an independent judicial inquiry is a particularly appropriate method of fully ascertaining the facts, determining responsibilities, punishing those responsible and preventing the repetition of such acts (see 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 29). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this regard, as well as on the comments made by the ITUC in 2007.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments the Committee raised a number of points about the national legislation as follows:

- the need for measures to set up an independent body that has the trust of the parties and is able to rule promptly on difficulties encountered in defining the minimum service where the parties are unable to agree as to the minimum service in transport and communications (which are not deemed essential in the strict sense of the term); and
- the need for measures to ensure that compulsory arbitration (established in sections 342, 350 and 351 of the Labour Code) is restricted to cases where the two parties agree to request it, in essential services in the strict sense of the term, or in the event of acute national crisis.

The Committee trusts that the Government will take the measures requested very shortly, in consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, and asks it inform it of any developments in the situation.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the Office.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It takes note of the observations of 29 August 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on legislative issues that the Committee has already raised.

In its previous comments, the Committee raised the following matters.

Article 1 of the Convention. Need to include in the national legislation specific provisions: (a) to protect all workers, and not only trade union delegates as provided in the Labour Code, against acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during employment; (b) to provide expressly for appeal procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference; (c) to provide for rapid appeal procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions for violations of section 3 of the draft new Labour Code, which provides that no employer may take into consideration membership of a trade union and trade union activities of workers in making decisions about recruitment, performance and distribution of work, termination of the employment contract, etc.

Article 2. Need to include in the draft Labour Code specific provisions on protection against acts of interference in the internal affairs of workers' and employers' organizations, accompanied by efficient and expeditious procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions.

The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary steps to ensure that the provisions of the new Labour Code, which have been under preparation for many years, are fully consistent with Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate all progress towards this end in its next report.

Guinea-Bissau

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes that the report has not been received. The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2008, referring to the issues examined by the Committee.

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been referring to the following matters:

Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that it intended to pursue the process of revision of the General Labour Act, Title XI of which contains provisions on collective bargaining, and to take steps so that this text would guarantee agricultural workers and dockworkers the rights envisaged in the Convention. The Committee notes that it previously noted the Government's indication that the draft Labour Code provided for the adaptation of the application of its provisions to the specific characteristics of the work performed by agricultural workers and dockworkers. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments relating to this draft legislation and hopes that this draft will guarantee agricultural workers and dockworkers the rights provided for by the Convention.

The Committee previously asked the Government to send information on the measures taken to adopt the special legislation which, under section 2(2) of Act No. 08/41 on freedom of association, was to regulate the right to collective bargaining of public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee once again requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in this regard.

Finally, the Committee previously asked the Government to keep it informed of any developments with regard to the promotion of collective bargaining in the public and private sectors (training and information activities, seminars with the social partners, etc.), and to send statistics on the collective agreements concluded (by sector) and the number of workers they cover. The Committee notes that the comments made by the ITUC show that the situation with regard to collective bargaining is unsatisfactory. It reminds the Government once again that Article 4 of the Convention provides that "measures appropriate to national conditions shall be taken, where necessary, to encourage and promote the full development and utilisation of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organisations and workers' organisations, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements". The Committee requests the Government to take concrete measures to promote greater use in practice of collective bargaining in the private and public sectors, and to indicate any developments concerning this situation, including the number of new agreements signed and the number of workers covered by such agreements.

The Committee hopes that a detailed report will be provided for examination next year in the context of the regular report examination cycle and that it will contain full information on the points raised as well as on the comments made by the ITUC.

Haiti

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it requested the Government to reply to the observations of the ITUC relating to a raid by armed police at the premises of a trade union centre, the Trade Union Coordination of Haiti, and the murder of a delegate of the Union of Federated Cooperative Drivers. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's rebuttal in its report of the ITUC's allegations and its indication that various investigations have been conducted by the police authorities and that no reference has ever been made to the death of a member of this union. The Government adds that there have been no further violations of freedom of association since the establishment of the rule of law following the June 2006 elections. The Committee notes these indications. It recalls that a free and independent trade union movement can only develop in conditions in which fundamental human rights are respected and that all States have an undeniable duty to defend a social climate where respect for the law reigns as the only way of guaranteeing respect for and protection of individuals. The Committee notes the latest communication from the ITUC dated 29 August 2008, which is currently being translated. The matters raised therein will be taken into consideration during the next examination of the application of the Convention.

Amendment of the legislation. The Committee recalls once again that its comments have for many years referred to the need to take measures in relation to the national legislation to bring it into conformity with the requirements of the Convention through:

- the amendment of section 34 of the Decree of 4 November 1983 which gives the Government broad powers of supervision over trade unions, and sections 185, 190, 199, 200 and 206 of the Labour Code, which allow for compulsory arbitration at the request of only one party to a labour dispute;
- the amendment of sections 233 and 239 of the Labour Code so as to remove the impediments to the right of association of minors and to allow foreign workers to have access to trade union office, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the country; and
- the repeal or amendment of section 236 of the Penal Code, under which government consent is required for the establishment of an association of over 20 members. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the formality of the legal registration of associations by the Directorate of Labour offers them an opportunity to carry out administrative procedures and does not constitute interference in their affairs. The Committee wishes to recall that, under the terms of Article 2 of the Convention, workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. Accordingly, any legislation which requires prior approval at the discretion of the authorities of the statutes and by-laws of representative organizations of workers or employers is incompatible with the provisions of the Convention.

In general terms, the Committee notes the Government's indication that a Secretariat of State responsible for judicial reform was appointed in June 2006, but that the political troubles prevented it from reporting on the progress of its work. The Government adds that it is engaged in the modernization of legal texts and is pursuing the work that has been commenced. The Committee trusts that the Government's next report will indicate tangible progress in the revision of the national legislation to bring it fully into conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to take into account in this respect all the points raised and hopes that it will be possible to continue the technical assistance provided to the Government by the Office on these issues.

Finally, the Committee previously requested the Government to specify the texts ensuring and governing the trade union rights of workers in the rural sector and of domestic workers and noted that they were excluded from the scope of the provisions on freedom of association in the Labour Code. Furthermore, with a view to assessing more fully the recognition of the right to organize of public officials, the Committee also requested the Government to provide a copy of the Decree of 17 July 2005 amending the Act of 1982 issuing the conditions of service of the public service. The Committee notes that the Government confines itself to indicating that workers in the rural sector and domestic workers are protected by the Labour Code. However, the Committee recalls that it noted previously that, under the terms of sections 257 (domestic workers) and 381 (workers in the rural sector) of the Labour Code, the provisions of the Labour Code respecting the exercise of the right to organize were not applicable to them. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take all the necessary measures (through an amendment to the Labour Code or the adoption of a specific text) to ensure that domestic workers and workers in the rural sector explicitly benefit from the right to organize. The Committee urges the Government to indicate any progress achieved in this respect and to provide a copy of the Decree of 17 July 2005 amending the 1982 Act issuing the conditions of service in the public service.

Comments by the ITUC. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made in 2007 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention. These comments related to legislative issues concerning the dispute settlement machinery and acts of discrimination and interference in certain enterprises which have not been penalized. Furthermore, according to the ITUC, the labour inspectorate is unable to operate and the judicial system is dysfunctional. The Government indicates in its reply that the labour inspectorate is not incapable of operating, even though it is not functioning at full efficiency, and that the judicial system has been under reform since 2006 and is now in operation as a result of the restoration of courts throughout the country. The Committee requests the Government to provide additional information in this regard, including the number of complaints of violations of trade union rights to the labour inspectorate and the courts, the average duration of the investigation of cases and the outcomes of legal proceedings.

With regard to the ITUC's comments that workers in rural areas and the informal economy, self-employed workers and domestic workers are not covered by the Labour Code and have no trade union rights, the Government indicates in its report that all workers in the sectors referred to benefit in practice from trade union rights and provides certain examples of representative organizations in these sectors which have sought the registration of their by-laws with the authorities. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in future reports on the number of collective agreements in the sectors referred to and their coverage.

The Committee also notes the ITUC's communication dated 29 August 2008. The issues raised therein will be considered during its next examination of the application of the Convention.

Articles 1, 2 and 4 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate any developments concerning: (i) the adoption of a specific provision establishing protection against anti-union discrimination in hiring practices; (ii) the adoption of provisions affording in general adequate protection for workers against acts of anti-union discrimination, accompanied by effective and expeditious procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions; and (iii) the revision of section 34 of the Decree of 4 November 1983 empowering the Social Organizations Branch of the Department of Labour and Social Welfare to intervene in the drafting of collective agreements. In its report, the Government indicates that the requested amendments to the legislation have not yet been adopted, but specifies that the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour intervenes to settle any dispute when so requested by trade union organizations. The Government adds that the intervention of the authorities in the formulation of collective agreements is confined to verifying their conformity with legal provisions and does not therefore constitute interference. While noting the persistence of the difficulties confronting the country, the Committee trusts that the Government will soon report progress in the adoption of legislative measures to bring the national legislation into full conformity with the Convention.

Iraq

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

In its previous observation, the Committee took note of comments sent in 2006 and 2007 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) reporting serious instances of violence and breach of freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining, including instances of anti-union violence and a directive prohibiting companies in the oil sector from cooperating with members of trade unions. In its reply, the Government reiterates that acts of terrorism are indiscriminate in terms of the population they affect, which includes trade union officers. It nonetheless adds that security in the country has improved, that criminal activities are on the decline and that the Government's plan to establish the rule of law will help to create a more favourable climate for the trade union movement. As for the dispute in the oil sector, the Government states that an amicable settlement was reached following the signing of an agreement by the Ministry of Petroleum and the petroleum unions in Basra. The Committee takes notes of this information and expresses the hope that it will be possible in the near future for trade union rights and the right to collective bargaining to be exercised normally and in observance of fundamental rights, and in a climate free from violence, duress, fear and any kind of threat.

The Committee notes the communication of 29 August 2008 from the ITUC raising a number of legislative issues on which the Committee has already commented and drawing attention to the persistence of the serious violations of freedom of association. The Committee notes the Government's reply of 18 November 2008 and asks it to comment on the ITUC's comments concerning arrests, detentions and acts of violence against trade unionists.

The Committee also takes note of the discussions that took place in the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2008), on Iraq's application of the Convention. It notes that the matters discussed included the need to amend certain provisions of the draft Labour Code of 2007 in order to align them more closely with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee notes that in its conclusions, the Conference Committee expressed the firm hope that the draft Code would be amended along the lines requested by the Committee, in full consultation with the social partners, and that it would be adopted without delay. The Conference Committee also called upon the Government to ensure that the laws and practice of the previous regime were no longer applied and expressed the hope that all workers, including public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, would be able fully to enjoy effective protection in accordance with the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee notes that in its report the Government states that the draft Labour Code has been referred to the Consultative Council (Majlis Al-Shura) so that Parliament can examine and adopt it. It also notes the information that the Tripartite Consultation Committee has recommended that a Ministry of Labour representative who took part in that Committee's discussion should relay its observations to the Consultative Council with a view to determining how they should be implemented to take account of the demands of the national interest. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary steps to ensure that the draft Labour Code is fully in keeping with the requirements of the Convention and that it will take due account to that end of all the following points, which the Committee raised in its previous observation.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the guarantees laid down in the draft Labour Code for protection against acts of anti-union discrimination apply to trade union founders and chairpersons and to trade union officers but not to trade union members. Furthermore, the draft does not establish adequate guarantees against discrimination at the time of recruitment. The Committee also noted that although it covers anti-union dismissals, the draft does not address other adverse measures affecting trade union membership or activities. It pointed out that protection against acts of anti-union discrimination must apply to trade union members as well as union officers, and must cover not only dismissal but any other measure amounting to anti-union discrimination (transfer, demotion and other measures that have adverse effects). Furthermore, the protection provided for by the Convention applies upon recruitment, in the course of employment and at the time of separation. Lastly, the general provisions of the law prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination are not enough if they are not accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination should therefore be ensured by various means adapted to national law and practice that prevent or effectively redress such acts. The Committee requests the Government to take due account of the principles recalled above and to take the necessary steps to amend the draft Labour Code so as to ensure adequate protection for members of trade unions and trade union officers against acts of anti-union discrimination.

Article 4. In its previous comments the Committee noted that section 142 of the draft Labour Code establishes a duty to bargain in good faith when a request to open collective negotiations has been submitted by a registered union representing no less than 50 per cent of the workers employed at the establishment or enterprise, or where such a request has been submitted jointly by several registered unions representing no less than 50 per cent of the workers to whom the collective agreement is to apply. The Committee pointed out that problems may arise where it is established by law that a trade union must receive the support of 50 per cent of the members of a bargaining unit to be recognized as a bargaining agent: a union that fails to secure this absolute majority is thus denied the possibility of bargaining. It noted that if no union – or group of unions, as provided for in section 142 – covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should not be denied to the unions in the unit concerned, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 142 of the draft Labour Code accordingly.

The Committee trusts that in its next report, the Government will indicate the progress made in revising the draft Labour Code to bring it fully in to line with the Convention. It hopes that the technical assistance provided by the Office in preparing the draft will be pursued in respect of these matters.

Articles 1, 4 and 6. The Committee has been noting for many years that Act No. 150 of 1987 on public servants which the Government is planning to repeal contains no provisions affording the guarantees established in the Convention (protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference and the right to collective bargaining of employment conditions) to public servants and public sector employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government merely states that public sector employees are not subject to the provisions of Act No. 52 of 1987 on trade unions. The Committee observes that the draft Labour Code excludes employees of the public service from its scope. The Government indicated previously – although it provided no legal text – that public servants do have such protection pursuant to the laws and regulations applying to the enterprises and institutions that employ them.

The Committee recalls that Article 6 of the Convention provides that only public servants engaged in the administration of the State may be excluded from the Convention's scope; all other persons employed by the Government, public enterprises or autonomous public institutions should benefit from the guarantees afforded by the Convention. The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that, in consultation with the social partners and experts from the Office, a recommendation was drawn up with a view to including in the new Labour Code provisions on the trade union rights of public sector workers, which will give them the rights provided for in Articles 1, 3 and 6 of the Convention. The Committee notes this information and asks the Government to provide information in its next report on all progress made in this respect.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee has been commenting for many years on the fact that Act No. 52 of 1987 on trade union organizations contains no provisions to give effect to Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the draft Labour Code will contain provisions to promote collective bargaining.

Trade union monopoly and interference in trade union activities. The Committee notes that according to a statement made by the Government representative to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, Act No. 52 of 1987 established a de facto monopoly of the Confederation of Iraqi Workers' Unions by forbidding the establishment of other unions or federations. However, according to the Government representative, the Act was in force only on paper, in that since April 2003 other unions have been set up in several sectors notwithstanding the lack of a proper legal framework. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee's discussions also addressed the need to repeal Decision No. 8750 of 8 August 2005, the provisions of which have been used by the Government to freeze the trade unions' bank assets.

In the Committee's view, texts such as these which have not yet been formally repealed can generate uncertainty in law and hinder the development of collective bargaining within the meaning of the Convention and of other trade union activities. The Committee trusts that the Government will shortly indicate that Act No. 52 of 1987 and Decision No. 8750 of 2005 have been formally repealed.

Jamaica

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments of 29 August 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which are being translated and will be considered at the next examination of Jamaica's application of the Convention. The Committee takes note of the Government's reply to the ITUC's comments of 2006 and 2007, and notes in particular that: (1) with regard to the non-deduction of the trade union dues of members of the National Workers' Union (NWU) in the oil sector, the parties have resolved the matter by agreement; and (2) regarding the obstacles faced by trade unions in the export processing zones, these zones have been virtually depleted; and the trade unions of Jamaica support the Labour Relations and Industrial Disputes Act, including the provisions on representation.

Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it referred to the extensive power of the Minister to refer an industrial dispute to arbitration (sections 9, 10, and 11(A) of the Labour Relations and Industrial Disputes Act). The Committee notes that according to the Government: (1) the Committee's observations have been noted; (2) the Minister exercises the power in question only where the public interest is being jeopardized or where the dispute requires urgent or expeditious settlement; and (3) the Labour Relations and Industrial Disputes Act is under constant review. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute is acceptable only at the request of both parties or in instances where a strike may be restricted or even banned, i.e. in the event of a dispute in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely services the interruption of which could endanger the life or personal safety of the whole or part of the population. The Committee again asks the Government to provide information in its next report on all progress made in amending the abovementioned Act.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with regret that no report has been received from the Government. The Committee also notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008, which are being translated and will be taken up by the Committee in its next examination of the application of the Convention by Jamaica. The Committee also requests the Government to send its observations in relation to the ITUC's comments of 2007 on acts of anti-union discrimination and the refusal to recognize a trade union, and also on the fact that there are no trade unions in the export processing zones.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that its previous comments referred to the following matters:

- the denial of the right to negotiate collectively in the case of workers in a bargaining unit when these workers do not amount to more than 40 per cent of the workers in the unit or when, if the former condition is satisfied, a single union that is engaged in the procedure of obtaining recognition does not obtain 50 per cent of the votes of the workers in a ballot that the minister has caused to be taken (section 5(5) of Act No. 14 of 1975 and section 3(1)(d) of its regulations); and
- the need to take measures to amend the legislation so that a ballot is made possible when one or more trade unions are already established as bargaining agents and another trade union claims that it has more affiliated members in the bargaining unit than the other trade unions, and therefore invokes its most representative status in the unit in order to be considered as a bargaining agent.

The Committee recalls once again that, by ratifying the Convention, the State undertook to promote collective bargaining and that this implied granting collective bargaining rights to the most representative trade union or (jointly) trade unions. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures in the very near future to amend its legislation, lowering the percentage mentioned and allowing a ballot in cases of disputes concerning representativeness, so as to bring it into full conformity with the Convention as soon as possible. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Kazakhstan

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend its legislation so as to ensure the right to organize of judges (article 23(2) of the Constitution and section 11(4) of the Law on Social Associations). The Committee notes the Government's explanation that judges have a special legal status within the State system and the particular nature of their function justifies the constitutional limitation of their rights. The Committee recalls that the only exceptions authorized by Convention No. 87 are members of the police and the armed forces and therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that judges can establish organization for defence and furtherance of their interests. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to specify the categories of workers covered by the term "law enforcement bodies" whose right to organize is restricted under the same provisions. The Committee notes from the Government's report, as well as from the definition provided for in section 256(2) of the Labour Code (2007), that firefighting and prison services are included in the definition of the "law enforcement bodies" and therefore, its personnel is excluded from the right to organize. The Committee considers that while exclusion from the right to organize of the armed forces and the police, as stated above, is not contrary to the provisions of Convention No. 87, the same cannot be said for fire service personnel and prison staff. The Committee is of the opinion that the functions exercised by these two categories of public servants should not justify their exclusion from the right to organize on the basis of Article 9 of the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 56). The Committee therefore requests the Government to ensure that fire service personnel and prison staff enjoy the right to organize. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Right to establish organizations without previous authorization. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government makes reference to section 10(1) of the Law on Social Associations, applicable to employers' organizations and providing for a minimum requirement of ten people to form an association. The Committee recalls that a requirement of a membership of at least ten employers to create an employers' organization is too high and likely to be an obstacle to the free creation of employers' organizations. It therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend its legislation so as to lower this requirement. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to provide its observations on the comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC), dated 10 August 2006, referring to violations of Article 2 of the Convention in practice, in particular high registration cost, which makes registration of trade unions almost impossible. In view that no information has been provided by the Government in this respect, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide its observations on the comments of the ICFTU.

Article 3. Right of organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee notes Chapter 32 of the Labour Code (2007) regulating collective labour disputes. The Committee understands that the process of settlement of collective labour disputes begins with the procedure provided for by section 289, which requires that claims of workers should be formulated at the meeting (conference) of employees gathering not less than half of the total workforce and adopted by the majority of those present. The Committee considers that trade unions should be free to regulate the procedure of submitting claims to the employer and that the legislation should not impede the functioning of a trade union by obliging a trade union to call a general meeting every time there is a claim to be made to an employer. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend section 289 of the Labour Code so as to ensure the right of trade unions to submit claims to the employers without their prior approval by a general meeting of workers. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee notes that the right to strike is prohibited in the civil service (section 10(6) of the Law on Civil Service). Furthermore, according to section 231(2) of the Labour Code, public service employees cannot participate in any action impeding normal functioning of the service and their official duties. The Committee therefore understands that the right to strike of public servants is restricted or even prohibited. The Committee considers that the prohibition of the right to strike should be limited to public (or civil, as the case may be) servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee notes that pursuant to section 230 of the Code, the list of services considered public was adopted by the Government on 27 September 2007 and concerns categories of workers who cannot be considered as exercising authority in the name of the State. With regard to the “civil service”, while noting from the Government’s report that teachers, doctors and bank employees are not civil servants, the Committee requests the Government to provide a full list of the services falling into this category. In the light of the above, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, including through amendment of the relevant legislative provisions, in order to ensure that the prohibition of the right to strike is limited only to public (or civil, as the case may be) servants exercising authority in the name of the State. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee notes that pursuant to section 303(1) of the Labour Code, strikes are illegal in organizations carrying out dangerous industrial activities (subsection (1)) and in other cases provided for by the national legislation (subsection (5)). The Committee requests the Government to clarify which organizations fall into the category of organizations carrying out dangerous industrial activities and the categories of workers whose right to strike is so restricted. The Committee further requests the Government to indicate all other categories of workers whose right to strike is restricted by other legislative texts and to provide copies thereof.

The Committee further notes that according to section 303(2), in the rail and public transports, civil aviation and communications, a strike may be held if the necessary range of services, as determined on the basis of a prior agreement with the local executive authorities, is maintained. The Committee recalls that in situations in which a total prohibition of strikes would not appear to be justified (as in services mentioned above) and where, without calling into question the right to strike of the large majority of workers, one might consider ensuring that users’ basic needs are met or that facilities operate safely or without interruption, the minimum service as a possible alternative to a total prohibition would be appropriate. However, in the view of the Committee, such a service should meet at least two requirements. Firstly, and this aspect is paramount, it must genuinely and exclusively be a minimum service, that is one which is limited to the operations which are strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population or the minimum requirements of the service, while maintaining the effectiveness of the pressure brought to bear. Secondly, since this system restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities. It would be highly desirable for negotiations on the definition and organization of the minimum service not to be held during a labour dispute, so that all parties can examine the matter with the necessary objectivity and detachment. The parties might also envisage the establishment of a joint or independent body responsible for examining rapidly and without formalities the difficulties raised by the definition and application of such a minimum service and empowered to issue enforceable decisions (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 161 and 162). The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend section 303(2) of the Labour Code so as to ensure the application of these principles. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee notes that according to section 298(2) of the Labour Code, the decision to call a strike is taken by a meeting (conference) of workers (their representatives) gathering not less than half the total workforce and the decision is adopted if not less than two-thirds of those present at the meeting (conference) have voted for it. The Committee considers that while a requirement of a strike ballot does not, in principle, raise problems of compatibility with the Convention, the ballot method, the quorum and the majority required should not be such that the exercise of the right to strike becomes very difficult, or even impossible in practice; if a member State deems it appropriate to establish in its legislation provisions which require a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast and that the required quorum and majority are fixed at reasonable level (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 170). In these circumstances, the Committee considers that while the quorum provided for by section 298(2) seems to be compatible with the freedom of association principles, the requirement that a decision to strike should be taken by two-thirds of those present at the meeting is excessive and limits the right to strike. The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend section 298(2) of the Labour Code so as to lower this requirement and so as to ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast in determining the outcome of a strike ballot. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee notes that section 299(2)(2) of the Labour Code imposes the obligation to indicate, in the strike notice, its possible duration. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether workers or their organizations can declare a strike for an indefinite period of time.

Article 5. Right of organizations to establish federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations. For several years, the Committee had been requesting the Government to amend section 106 of the Civil Code and article 5(4) of the Constitution so as to lift the ban on financial assistance to national trade unions by an international organization. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that other than monetary, the financial assistance also includes such forms of support as property, equipment, motorized transport, communications and printing equipment. The Committee considers that legislation prohibiting the acceptance by a national trade union of financial assistance from an international organization of workers to which it is affiliated infringes the principles concerning the right to affiliate with international organizations of workers and that all national organizations of workers and employers should have the right to receive financial assistance from international organizations of workers and employers respectively, whether they are affiliated or not to the latter. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take steps to amend section 106 of the Civil Code, as well as article 5 of the Constitution, so as to lift this prohibition and to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

(ratification: 2001)

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had requested the Government to institute an independent investigation into the comments concerning interference by the employer in trade unions' internal affairs and activities and refusals to bargain collectively submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). The Committee regrets that no information has been provided by the Government in this respect. The Committee reiterates its request and trusts that the Government will be more cooperative in the future.

Articles 1, 2 and 4 of the Convention. The Committee had previously requested the Government to specify the categories of worker covered by the term "law enforcement bodies" whose right to organize is restricted under article 23(2) of the Constitution and section 11(4) of the Law on Social Associations. The Committee notes from the Government's report, as well as from the definition provided for in section 256(2) of the Labour Code (2007), that fire-fighting and prison services are included in the definition of the "law enforcement bodies" and therefore excluded from the right to organize and to bargain collectively. The Committee considers that while the armed forces and the police can be excluded from the application of the Convention, the same cannot be said for fire service personnel and prison staff. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that these categories of worker enjoy the rights afforded by the Convention.

Article 1. The Committee notes sections 14, 170 and 177 of the Labour Code, as well as section 141 of the Criminal Code (1997) which provide for an adequate protection against anti-union discrimination.

Article 2. The Committee had previously noted that sections 4(4) and 18(2) of the Law on Trade Unions prohibited acts of interference in the affairs of workers' organizations and requested the Government to provide details on the procedures available to trade unions in cases of infringement, as well as the specific sanctions provided by the legislation. The Committee notes sections 150 and 150-1 of the Criminal Code concerning interference in the activities of social organizations and interference in the legitimate activities of workers' representatives, respectively, and providing for a penalty equivalent to up to five times the monthly wage or imprisonment to be imposed on an "official" found guilty of committing the offence using his or her position. The Committee requests the Government to clarify whether this provision applies in both the public and the private sectors.

Article 4. The Committee notes that according to section 282(2) of the Labour Code, workers who are not members of any trade union may either authorize an existing trade union or choose another representative for the purposes of collective bargaining. If several workers' representatives exist at the enterprise, they can establish a joint representative body to negotiate a collective agreement. The Committee considers that when a representative trade union exists and functions at the enterprise, allowing other workers' representatives to bargain collectively could not only undermine the position of the trade union concerned, but also infringe upon the rights guaranteed under Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend its legislation so as to ensure that where there exist in the same undertaking both a trade union representative and an elected representative, the existence of the latter is not used to undermine the position of the union in the collective bargaining process. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee notes that the obligation imposed on the employer to conclude a collective agreement was repealed (once the Law on Collective Agreements was repealed) and that section 281 of the Labour Code enshrines the principle of free and voluntary negotiations. The Committee notes, however, that under section 91 of the Code on Administrative Breaches (2001), an unfounded refusal to conclude a collective agreement is punished by a fine. The Committee recalls that the legislation, which imposes an obligation to achieve a result, particularly when sanctions are used in order to ensure that an agreement is concluded, is contrary to the principle of free and voluntary negotiations. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on the application of section 91 of the Code in practice.

Article 6. The Committee notes that civil and public servants enjoy collective bargaining rights under section 8 of the Law on Civil Service and section 236 of the Labour Code, respectively. It notes, in this respect, the list of collective agreements concluded in the civil service between various trade unions and the relevant ministries.

Kenya

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)
(ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee takes note of the adoption of the Labour Relations Act (LRA) 2007. The Committee notes with interest that section 5 of the LRA prohibits acts of anti-union discrimination on the basis of trade union membership or activities, both during the recruitment period and the entire course of employment.

The Committee further notes that under section 10 claims of infringement of employees' rights, including claims of anti-union discrimination, must first be referred in writing to the minister to appoint a conciliator and, should conciliation fail to resolve the claim within 30 days (or a longer period, should both parties agree) from the appointment of the conciliator, section 73(1) provides that the claim may then be referred to the Industrial Court. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the average time period for the adjudication of anti-union discrimination cases by the Industrial Court.

Protection against acts of interference. The Committee observes that the LRA makes no provision for protection against acts of interference, either directly or indirectly. Recalling that Governments which have ratified the Convention are under the obligation to take specific action, in particular through legislative means, to ensure respect for the guarantees laid down in Article 2 concerning acts of interference, the Committee requests the Government to take legislative measures so as to make express provision for rapid appeal procedures, coupled with effective and dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference in order to ensure the application in practice of Article 2 of the Convention.

Article 4. Trade union recognition for purposes of collective bargaining. The Committee notes that section 54(1) of the LRA requires an employer to recognize a trade union if the said trade union represents "a simple majority of unionizable employees". Similarly, section 54(2) provides that employers' federations shall recognize a trade union for the purposes of collective bargaining "if the trade union represents a simple majority of unionizable employees employed by the group of employers or the employers who are members of the employers' organization within a sector". The Committee recalls, in this respect, that problems may arise when the law stipulates that a trade union must receive the support of 50 per cent of the members of a bargaining unit to be recognized as a bargaining agent: a representative union which fails to secure this absolute majority is thus denied the possibility of bargaining (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 241). The Committee therefore requests the Government to ensure that section 54(1) and (2) of the LRA are applied in such a manner that, where no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining may still be possible for the unions failing to acquire this percentage.

Collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee had previously noted that the 14 May 2004 Memorandum of Understanding between the Government and the Union of Civil Servants concerning recognition, negotiating and grievance procedures for civil servants did not apply to employees of the Prison Department, the National Youth Service and teachers under the Teachers' Service Commission, and had requested the Government to indicate whether those categories of employee enjoyed the right of collective bargaining under any legislative provisions. In this respect, the Committee notes that, according to the ITUC, those categories of employee were still denied the right of collective bargaining, although civil servants not involved in State administration are allowed to bargain collectively. The Committee also notes, however, the Government's statement that it had signed a collective agreement with the Union of Civil Servants that entered into force in June 2008, and that negotiations with teachers were ongoing.

As concerns the LRA, the Committee observes that section 61(1) provides that the minister may, after consultations with the National Labour Board, make regulations establishing machinery for determining terms and conditions of employment for any category of employee in the public sector. The Committee also notes that under section 61(3) the minister may determine different terms and conditions for different categories of public employee. Recalling that all public servants, with the sole possible exception of those directly engaged in the administration of the State, should enjoy the right of collective bargaining, the Committee requests the Government to: (1) take legislative measures to ensure that employees of the Prison Department and the National Youth Service enjoy the right of collective bargaining; (2) indicate the categories of public employee, if any, for whom the minister has determined terms and conditions of employment under section 61(3) of the LRA; and (3) to provide full information on the practical application of section 61(1), which provides for the establishment of collective bargaining machinery in the public sector.

Kiribati

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes with interest that the Kiribati Tripartite Committee drafted, with the assistance of the ILO, several amendments to national labour laws in order to give effect to the Committee's previous comments. The Committee notes, in particular, that, upon adoption of the Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Amendment Bill, section 21 of the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations Act, will be amended by introducing a comprehensive guarantee of the right to organize for all workers and employers. Moreover, upon adoption of the Industrial Relations Code Amendment Bill, section 39 of the Industrial Relations Code will be amended so that a strike decision can be adopted upon approval by a majority of employees who voted in the ballot. These amendments have been recently approved in the first reading by Parliament. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of progress made in the adoption of these amendments to section 21 of the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations Act and section 39 of the Industrial Relations Code.

The Committee also notes, however, that certain issues have not been addressed yet or are still under consideration.

Article 2 of the Convention. Minimum membership requirement. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 7 of the Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Act so as to lower the minimum membership requirement for the registration of an employers' organization which is set at seven members. The Committee notes, from the Government's report, that due note has been taken of this comment, which is currently under review by the Ministry of Labour, the Kiribati Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the Kiribati Trade Union Congress; the Government will inform the Committee on the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the outcome of consultations and to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section 7 of the Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations Act so as to lower the minimum membership requirement for the registration of an employers' organization.

Right of public employees to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee had previously noted that section L.1 of the National Conditions of Service provides that all employees are free to join a "recognized" staff association or union and had requested the Government to amend this section, given that there is no provision in the law relating to the recognition of trade unions. The Committee notes the Government's indication that due note has been taken of this comment which is currently under review with the social partners and the Committee will be kept informed of the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the outcome of consultations and to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section L.1 of the National Conditions of Service so as to remove the reference to "recognized" staff associations or unions.

Article 3. Right of employers' and workers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules, elect their representatives in full freedom, organize their administration and activities and formulate their programmes. Right to elect representatives freely. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that there is no provision in the law regarding the right of workers and employers to elect their representatives. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the current practice in which workers and employers elect their representatives, on the basis of their freely drawn constitution, is in line with the Convention. The Government adds that it has taken due note of the Committee's comment which is currently under review by the social partners and the Committee will be kept informed of the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee takes due note of this information.

Compulsory arbitration. In a previous direct request, the Committee had requested the Government to amend sections 8(1)(d), 12, 27 and 28 of the Industrial Relations Code so as to limit the possibility of prohibiting strikes and imposing compulsory arbitration only to those cases which would be in conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes from the Government's report that section 12 will be amended upon adoption of the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill through addition of a new section 12(A)(1) according to which the registrar may only refer a trade dispute to an arbitration tribunal if: (a) all the parties to the dispute request such referral; (b) the dispute is in the public services involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State; (c) industrial action has been protracted or is tending to endanger or has endangered the personal health, safety or welfare of the community or part of it; (d) conciliation has failed and the parties are unlikely to resolve the dispute.

In this regard, the Committee once again recalls that compulsory arbitration is acceptable under the Convention only at the request of both parties to the dispute, in essential services in the strict sense of the term, and for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The existence of protracted disputes (subsection (c)) and the failure of conciliation (subsection (d)) are not per se elements which justify the introduction of compulsory arbitration. Furthermore, the word "welfare" introduced in relation to essential services (subsection (c)) may include issues which go beyond the health and safety of the population in a strict sense and, in that case, would be contrary to the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to amend the Draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill so as to remove subsection (d) from draft section 12(A)(1)(d), as well as the reference to protracted industrial action and the "welfare of the community" from draft section 12(A)(1)(c) with a view to ensuring that compulsory arbitration is possible only where this is in conformity with the Convention.

Furthermore, concerning the conciliation and mediation machinery, the Committee considers that it should have the sole purpose of facilitating bargaining: it should not be so complex or slow that a lawful strike becomes impossible in practice or loses its effectiveness (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 171). The Committee observes in this regard that there are no specific time limits in the Industrial Relations Code for the exhaustion of conciliation proceedings and that sections 8(1)(a), (b), (c) and 9(1)(a) give the Registrar and the Minister the power to prolong the negotiation, conciliation and settlement procedure at their discretion, without any fixed time limits, while according to section 27(1), a strike which takes place before the exhaustion of procedures prescribed for the settlement of trade disputes, shall be unlawful. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to ensure that specific time limits are introduced in the Industrial Relations Code so that the mediation and conciliation procedure is not so complex or slow that a lawful strike becomes impossible in practice.

Sanctions for strike action/essential services. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to lift the provision in section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code which has the effect of prohibiting industrial action and imposing heavy penalties including imprisonment in cases where a strike might “expose valuable property to the risk of destruction”. The Committee notes with interest that the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill will amend section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code so as to lift this provision. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of progress made in the adoption of the Draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill with a view to removing the provision of section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code which imposes heavy penalties including imprisonment for strikes in case they “expose valuable property to the risk of destruction”.

The Committee also recalls that in its previous comments, it had requested the Government to amend section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code which imposes penalties of imprisonment and heavy fines for strikes in essential services. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill will amend section 37 of the Industrial Relations Code so as to increase the relevant fines from $100 to $1,000 for strikes in essential services and from $500 to $2,000 for inciting others to participate in a strike in essential services; at the same time, the prison sentences of one year and 18 months, respectively, for strikes in essential services and incitement to participate, therein, have apparently not been amended.

The Committee further recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend section 30 of the Industrial Relations Code, which imposes sanctions of imprisonment and heavy fines against unlawful strikes in general. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that the prison sentences have been lifted in the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill but that the applicable fines have been increased to $1,000 from $100 in case of participation in an unlawful strike and have remained at $2,000 in case of incitement to participate in an unlawful strike.

In this respect, the Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore, measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. The Committee requests the Government to review the draft Industrial Relations Amendment Bill so as to amend sections 30 and 37 of the Industrial Relations Code in the manner indicated above.

Articles 5 and 6. Right to establish and join federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations of workers and employers. In its previous comments, the Committee requested information on the provisions which guarantee the right of workers’ and employers’ organizations to join federations and confederations of their own choice and to affiliate with international organizations of workers and employers. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that the draft Trade Unions and Employers’ Organizations Amendment Bill will amend section 21(2) of the Trade Unions and Employers’ Organizations Act, 1998, so as to provide that workers’ and employers’ organizations shall have the right to join a federation of trade unions or a federation of employers’ organizations and to affiliate with and participate in the affairs of any international workers’ organization and to contribute to or receive financial assistance from those organizations. The Committee considers that the term “international workers’ and employers’ organizations” would be more appropriate than “international workers’ organizations” given that the right to affiliate with international organizations should be guaranteed not only to workers’ but also to employers’ organizations. It, therefore, requests the Government to amend the draft Trade Unions and Employers’ Organizations Amendment Bill and to keep it informed of progress made in the adoption of the Bill with a view to introducing provisions guaranteeing the right of employers’ and workers’ organizations to establish federations and to affiliate with international organizations of their own choosing.

The Committee notes with interest from the Government’s report that the Kiribati tripartite committee drafted, with the assistance of the ILO, several amendments to national labour laws in order to give effect to the Committee’s previous comments. The Committee also notes however, that certain issues have not yet been addressed in the draft or are still under consideration.

Application of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 3 of the Industrial Relations Code excludes prison officers from the application of the provision concerning collective labour disputes and reminded the Government that prison officers should enjoy the rights and guarantees enshrined in the Convention. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that due note has been taken of this comment which is currently under review by the Ministry of Labour, the Kiribati Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the Kiribati Trade Union Congress. The Government will inform the Committee on the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee hopes that the discussions will lead to the amendment of section 3 of the Industrial Relations Code so that prison officers are not excluded from the rights and guarantees enshrined in the Convention.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that protection against acts of anti-union discrimination existed only at the time of hiring, and requested the Government to take measures to amend the legislation so as to ensure comprehensive protection against such acts during the employment relationship and at the time of dismissal. The Committee had also requested the Government to take measures so that the legislation includes express provisions for appeals and establishes sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination for membership or participation in the activities of a trade union.

The Committee notes from the text of the draft Act to Amend the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Act, 1998, that section 21 of the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Act is to be amended by adding a subsection (3) according to which “nothing contained in any law shall prohibit any worker from being or becoming a member of any trade union, or cause a worker to be dismissed or otherwise prejudiced by reason of that worker’s membership or participation in the activities of a trade union”. Furthermore, according to subsection (4) no employer shall make it a condition of employment of any worker to neither be nor become a member of a trade union and any such condition in any contract of employment shall be void. The Committee also notes that according to subsection (5), “[a]ny employer who contravenes subsection (4) ... shall be liable to a fine not exceeding US$1,000 and to a term of imprisonment not exceeding six months”. The Committee notes that whereas sufficiently dissuasive sanctions are provided for in relation to subsection (4), no sanctions are established in relation to a violation of subsection (3). The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken in order to modify the provisions of the draft Act to Amend the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Act, 1998, so that sufficiently dissuasive sanctions are imposed where a worker is dismissed or otherwise prejudiced because of his or her trade union membership or participation in the activities of a trade union.

Articles 2 and 3. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in the national legislation, no specific legal provisions dealt with the issue of mutual interference between employers’ and workers’ organizations and that there were no rapid procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference by employers against workers and workers’ organizations. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that due note has been taken of this comment which is currently under review by the Ministry of Labour, the Kiribati Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the Kiribati Trade Union Congress. The Government will inform the Committee on the outcome and measures taken as a result of these discussions. The Committee hopes that the review currently under way will lead to measures to modify the draft Act to Amend the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Act, 1998, so as to introduce provisions which ensure adequate protection against acts of interference in the establishment and functioning of trade unions as well as rapid procedures and dissuasive sanctions in this respect, in accordance with Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention.

Article 4. The Committee notes with interest, that upon adoption of the Trade Unions and Employer Organisations Amendment Bill, section 41 of the Industrial Relations Code will be amended by introducing a comprehensive guarantee of the right to engage in collective bargaining over wages, terms and conditions of employment, the relations between the parties and other matters of mutual interest; this guarantee will apply to every trade union or group of trade unions and also cover public servants under the national conditions of service. Moreover, the amendment provides that regulations may be made generally for the effective exercise of the right to collective bargaining, recognition of most representative organizations and the regulation of collective agreements. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the progress made in the adoption of the draft amendment to section 41 of the Industrial Relations Code. It further requests the Government to specify the provisions which guarantee this right to federations and confederations and to indicate in the future any regulations adopted to promote the effective exercise of the right to collective bargaining.

Furthermore, the Committee’s previous comments concerned sections 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 14 and 19 of the Industrial Relations Code, which allow referral of any trade dispute to compulsory arbitration at the request of one party or by decision of the authorities. The Committee is addressing this issue under Convention No. 87.

Kuwait

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes the Government’s report and its reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 10 August 2006. On 29 August 2008, the ITUC submitted additional comments on the application of the Convention. Both ITUC communications mainly refer to legislative issues already raised by the Committee in its previous observations.

The Committee had previously noted with interest the draft Labour Code, the provisions of which appear to resolve a number of discrepancies between the legislation and the provisions of the Convention that had been raised in its previous comments. In particular, it noted that the new draft Code appears to have eliminated the following provisions in the present Labour Code: the requirement of at least 100 workers to establish a trade union (section 71) and ten employers to form an association (section 86); the prohibition on joining a trade union for individuals under 18 years of age (section 72); the restrictions on trade union membership for non-national workers (section 72); the requirement for a certificate from the Minister of the Interior approving the founding members of a trade union (section 74); the prohibition on establishing more than one trade union per establishment, enterprise or activity (section 71); restrictions on the right to vote and to be elected to trade union office for non-nationals (section 72); the reversion of trade union assets to the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour in the event of dissolution (section 77); the restriction imposed on trade unions to join federations only where the activities are identical, or where industries are producing the same goods or supplying similar services (section 79).

The Committee had also commented upon a number of other provisions of the draft Labour Code and requested the Government to report the progress made with respect to the draft Code's adoption. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a number of revisions have been made to the draft Labour Code, and that it was still before the People's Assembly (Majlis El Umma) for discussion and adoption. In these circumstances, the Committee expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend the draft Labour Code, in accordance with its comments below, and requests the Government to provide a copy of the final version of the draft Labour Code with its next report.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. Domestic workers (section 5 of the draft Labour Code). Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 5 of the draft Labour Code, which excludes domestic workers from the Code's provisions, or otherwise indicate the manner in which the right of domestic workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing is ensured. It also requested the Government to provide a copy of the model contract it had promulgated for domestic workers and their employers. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government requests assistance with regard to the difficulty in extending the draft Labour Code's provisions to domestic workers since, as domestic workers are considered members of the family, it is difficult for the labour inspection department to enter private households to verify the application of the Code. In these circumstances, the Committee expects that the assistance requested will be provided by the Office in the very near future so as to guarantee domestic workers the right to establish and join occupational organizations. The Committee further requests the Government to indicate the legislation which governs labour relations of domestic workers.

Other categories of worker (section 5 of the draft Labour Code). Previously, the Committee had asked the Government to clarify the types of workers governed by other laws referred to in the exclusions set forth in section 5 of the draft Code. The Government states in this regard that the workers covered by other laws are government employees, seafarers and employees in the oil sector. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing is ensured to the abovementioned categories of workers and to provide copies of the legislation applicable to them – including the law governing the oil sector and the Civil Service Act.

Article 3. Minister's excessive power to examine the financial books and records of workers' and employers' organizations, and the global prohibition on accepting donations and legacies without approval of the ministry (section 100 of the draft Labour Code). The Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate whether section 100 of the draft Labour Code had been revised so as to ensure the right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their administration, including their finances, without interference by the public authorities. In respect of this matter, the Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that this provision has been annulled.

Overall prohibition on trade union political activities (section 100 of the draft Labour Code). Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to consider revising section 100 of the draft Code so as to eliminate the total ban on the political activities of workers' and employers' organizations, and to indicate the progress made in this regard. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the ban on political activities has been maintained, as such activities lie outside the purview of trade unions; the said prohibition is set out in subsection (1) of the new section 101 of the draft Labour Code. In these circumstances, the Committee once again recalls that legislation which prohibits all political activities for trade unions give rise to serious difficulties with regard to the provisions of the Convention. Some degree of flexibility in legislation is therefore desirable, so that a reasonable balance can be achieved between the legitimate interest of organizations in expressing their point of view on matters of economic and social policy affecting their members and workers in general, on the one hand, and the separation of political activities in the strict sense of the term and trade union activities, on the other (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 133). The Committee requests the Government to consider revising section 101 (formerly section 100) of the draft Code, so as to eliminate the total ban on political activities in keeping with the abovementioned principle, and to indicate any progress made in this regard.

Compulsory arbitration (sections 120 and 124 of the draft Labour Code). The Committee had previously noted that under section 120 of the draft Code the Conciliation Committee may, if it is unable to settle a dispute, refer the unsettled issues to the arbitration tribunal. The Committee had also noted that section 124 – now section 125, according to the Government – allows the competent ministry to intervene in a dispute without being asked to do so by any of the disputing parties, if need be, to bring about an amicable settlement of the dispute, and may also refer the dispute to the Conciliation Committee or the arbitration tribunal, as it deems appropriate.

The Committee notes the Government's request for clarification of its previous comment concerning these sections. In this respect, the Committee recalls that, in as far as, compulsory arbitration prevents strike action, it is contrary to the right of trade unions to freely organize their activities. Compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute and a strike is acceptable if it is at the request of both parties involved in a dispute, or if the strike in question may be restricted, even banned, i.e. in the case of disputes in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to amend sections 120 and 124 of the draft Labour Code, so as to ensure their full conformity with the principles mentioned above.

Article 5. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to establish federations and confederations. Right of employers to form federations (section 95 of the draft Labour Code). The Committee had previously noted that section 95 – now section 96, according to the Government – provides that employers shall have the right to form federations, according to the terms and conditions issued by the Minister, and requested the Government to provide information on any regulations issued by the Minister in this regard. The Committee notes the Government's indication that no regulations have been promulgated under it.

Restriction to one single federation (section 101 of the draft Labour Code). In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to amend section 101 of the draft Labour Code, which limits trade unions to the establishment of a single general federation. In this connection, the Committee notes with interest the Government's statement that this provision has been annulled. Nevertheless, the Committee further notes the Government's indication that section 102 has been amended to read as follows: "Trade unions which are proclaimed in accordance with the provisions of this chapter shall establish federations which defend their common interests. Proclaimed federations set up in accordance with the provisions of this chapter shall constitute a Confederation. The federations and the Confederation which are set up shall follow the same procedures as set out in the establishment of trade unions." The Committee observes that section 102, as amended, would appear to permit first-tier trade union and federation multiplicity but limits federations to the formation of a single confederation. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the appropriate measures to amend section 102 of the draft Labour Code, so as to ensure the right of workers to establish the organization of their own choosing at all levels, including the possibility of forming more than one confederation.

Lesotho

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008 concerning issues already raised by the Committee.

Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned sections 198F and 198G(1) of the Labour Code as introduced in the draft Amendment Bill (2006). In particular, the Committee had noted that section 198F provided access to the enterprise (in order to communicate with management, recruit members or perform other trade union functions) only to an authorized officer or official of a trade union which represented more than 35 per cent of the employees. The Committee had expressed its concern at practical effect that such a provision may have on the choice of workers of their trade union. The Committee notes the Government's explanation to the effect that the issue of access to the enterprise is guaranteed by section 198 of the Labour Code which provides for "reasonable facilities for conferring" and which will not be amended. The Government adds that the purpose of new section 198F is to conclude a written collective agreement regulating the issues of access which is mandatory in certain circumstances. The Committee notes that while section 198 imposes, in general terms, an obligation on employers to provide to trade union officers reasonable facilities, section 198F expressly grants specific advantages (access to premises to meet representatives of the employer, to recruit members, to hold a meeting of members and to perform any trade union functions in terms of a collective agreement) only to an authorized officer or official of a trade union that represents more than 35 per cent of the employees.

In addition, the Committee had previously noted that section 198G(1) specified that only the members of a registered trade union, which represented more than 35 per cent of the employees of an employer that employed ten or more employees, were entitled to elect workplace union representatives. The Committee had therefore requested the Government to amend section 198G(1) so as to allow all workers to either participate as candidates or voters in the election of workplace representatives. The Committee notes the Government's argument that the purpose of framing organizational rights is to require the employer, once the representativity threshold is met, to recognize these representatives. The Government is of the opinion that it would be inconsistent with the Convention to compel trade unions to allow non-members to vote in the election of trade union representatives.

The Committee considers that the workers' freedom of choice may be jeopardized if the distinction between most representative and minority unions results, in law or in practice, in granting privileges such as to influence unduly the choice of organization by workers (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 98). The Committee reiterates its previous comments and requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the above provisions influence the workers' choice of their trade union organization, as well as their right to elect their representatives.

The Committee had previously noted that section 51 of the draft Amendment Bill (amending section 232(5) of the Labour Code) provides that any strike in pursuance of a trade dispute that threatens the continuance of any essential service shall be unprotected. It further noted that under section 51 a strike that had commenced could be deemed to be unprotected retroactively, in cases where the Labour Commissioner or the Labour Court find that the strike concerned an essential service; as a consequence, workers could be dismissed or incur liability in tort not only for participating in an unprotected strike, but also for any conduct in contemplation or furtherance of an unprotected strike (new section 231 of the Labour Code introduced by section 50 of the draft Amendment Bill). The Committee had therefore requested the Government to consider amending or supplementing the law by adding a list of specific services which are considered to be essential – i.e. services, the interruption of which might endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population – or, in the alternative, to amend section 232(5) so that a strike becomes unprotected only if it continues after the Labour Court has decided that it concerns an essential service. The Committee notes that the Government refers to legislation which lists those services deemed to be essential. Noting, however, that it has not been attached, the Committee requests the Government to transmit a copy of the legislation setting out essential services in its next report.

Finally, the Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the Public Services Act, 2005. It notes that according to the Government, the Committee's comments on this law have been brought to the attention of the National Advisory Committee on Labour (NACOLA), and that NACOLA had in turn requested that these matters be referred to the Ministry of Public Service. Noting this information, the Committee expresses the hope that the Government will soon be in a position to provide full information on the measures taken:

- to amend section 19 of the Public Services Act (2005) so as to ensure that the prohibition of the right to strike in the public service is limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State;
- to establish compensatory guarantees, such as arbitration machinery for those workers who may be deprived of the right to strike; and
- to ensure that public officers' associations established under the Public Services Act are guaranteed the right to establish federations and confederations and affiliate with international organizations.

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the 6 November 2006 comments submitted by the Congress of Lesotho Trade Unions (COLETU). It also notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 29 August 2008, which primarily refer to matters previously raised by the Committee. Referring to its previous comments on the 2006 draft Amendment Bill, which amends several provisions of the Labour Code Order 1992, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the progress made with respect to the Bill's adoption and to provide a copy of the legislation as soon as it is adopted.

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining in the education sector. In its previous comments the Committee had taken note of statements submitted by the ITUC and COLETU on the Government's long-standing obstruction of collective bargaining in the education sector, including COLETU's observation that a case brought by its affiliate the Lesotho Teachers Trade Union (LTTU) had been pending before the High Court for 11 years, and had requested the Government to take all necessary measures so as to promote a prompt and negotiated solution to the long-standing disputes concerning teachers in the public sector.

The Committee notes that according to the Government, the case referred to by COLETU was filed in the Labour Court. The President of the Labour Court had recused himself in respect of this case, and the union has not pursued the matter through its legal counsel since. While noting this information, the Committee nevertheless regrets that the Government provides no indication that it has taken steps to promote a solution to the long-standing disputes in the education sector, as previously requested. It therefore once again requests the Government to take all necessary measures so as to promote a prompt and negotiated solution to the long-standing disputes concerning teachers in the public sector and guarantee to them the rights enshrined in the Convention.

Representativeness requirements for certification of a union as the exclusive bargaining agent. The Committee had previously noted that section 198B(2) of the Labour Code, as amended by the 2006 draft Amendment Bill, provides that the arbitrator may conduct a ballot "if appropriate" in the determination of disputes concerning trade union representativity. It had subsequently requested the Government to amend the Labour Code by introducing a formal requirement for ballots to be held in determination of trade union representativity, thereby removing the arbitrator's discretion as to whether a ballot is "appropriate" in the circumstances. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's statement that leaving the decision to conduct a ballot to the arbitrator's discretion is justified, as not all disputes concerning trade union representativity – such as those concerning whether particular employees fall inside the relevant bargaining unit or not – may be resolved by resorting to a ballot. The Government further indicates that the decisions of the arbitrator are subject to review by the Labour Court. The Committee trusts that under section 198B(2) of the Labour Code, as amended, disputes which require the holding of elections to determine which trade union is most representative are disposed of by means of a ballot. Additionally, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Labour Code so as to ensure that new organizations, or organizations failing to secure a sufficiently large number of votes, may ask for a new election after a certain period has elapsed since the previous election.

Recognition of the most representative union. The Committee had previously noted that section 198A(1)(b) of the Labour Code defines a representative trade union as “a registered trade union that represents the majority of the employees in the employ of an employer”, and that section 198A(1)(c) specifies that “a majority of employees in the employ of an employer means over 50 per cent of those employees”. It had subsequently requested the Government to take the necessary legislative measures so as to ensure that when no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights are granted to all the unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee notes that according to the Government, complying with the Committee’s request would require employers to enter into negotiations with several minority trade unions, leading to trade union fragmentation and inconsistent terms and conditions of employment for different employees. Such an approach, the Government further indicates, would be contrary to the country’s accepted industrial relations practices.

While noting this information, the Committee is compelled to recall that problems may arise when the law stipulates that a trade union must receive the support of 50 per cent of the members of a bargaining unit to be recognized as a bargaining agent; a representative union which fails to secure this absolute majority is thus denied the possibility of bargaining. The Committee considers that under such a system, if no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in this unit, at least on behalf of their own members (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 241). Accordingly, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Labour Code so as to ensure respect for the abovementioned principle.

Liberia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008, which are in the process of being translated. The points raised therein will be taken up by the Committee in its subsequent examination of the application of the Convention.

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been asking the Government to take the necessary steps to amend or repeal the following provisions, which are inconsistent with Articles 2, 3, 5 and 10 of the Convention:

- Decree No. 12 of 30 June 1980 prohibiting strikes;
- section 4601-A of the Labour Practices Law prohibiting agricultural workers from joining industrial workers’ organizations;
- section 4102, subsections 10 and 11, of the Labour Practices Law providing for the supervision of trade union elections by the Labour Practices Review Board; and
- section 4506 of the Labour Practices Law prohibiting workers in state enterprises and the public service from establishing trade unions.

In this regard, the Committee notes with satisfaction the Government’s statement that Decree No. 12 was repealed by an Act signed into law on 9 October; it requests the Government to provide a copy of the repealing legislation with its next report. The Committee further notes with interest the Government’s indication that it has initiated a labour law reform process that is being facilitated by the ILO. Under this reform process, consultations with stakeholders are being held until December 2008, and will be followed by a National Labour Conference in January 2009; the recommendations emanating from the consultations will be analysed and reviewed at the Conference, with a view to drafting a final revision of the laws. Noting that the foreseen revisions will take into account provisions of the legislation that had previously been identified as in violation of ILO Conventions, including sections 4601-A, 4102 and 4506 of the Labour Practices Law, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the labour law reform process will result in their repeal or amendment in the near future and requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, the progress made in this regard.

Finally, the Committee requests the Government to send its observations in respect of the 2006 ITUC comments concerning threats of arrest and prosecution of civil servants who took part in a strike in 2005.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008, which are in the process of being translated. The points raised therein will be taken up by the Committee in its next examination of the application of the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it has initiated a labour law reform process that is being facilitated by the ILO. Under the reform process, consultations with stakeholders are being held until December 2008, and will be followed by a National Labour Conference in January 2009; the recommendations emanating from the consultations will be analysed and reviewed at the Conference with a view to drafting a final revision of the laws. Further noting that the foreseen revisions will take into account provisions of the legislation that have been highlighted by the Committee as contravening ILO Conventions, the Committee expresses the hope that the reform process will take into full consideration the matters the Committee has been commenting upon for many years, which concern the need for:

- legislation guaranteeing to workers adequate protection against anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment, and during the employment relationship, accompanied by sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions;
- legislation guaranteeing to workers' organizations protection against acts of interference by employers and their organizations, including sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions; and
- legislation guaranteeing the right to collective bargaining to employees in state-owned enterprises and public servants who are not public officials engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee, once again pointing out the seriousness of the problems it has raised, expresses the firm hope that the labour law reform process will result in the near future in bringing the legislation into full conformity with the requirements of the Convention. It further requests the Government to provide information in its next report on developments in this regard.

Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. In previous comments, the Committee had drawn the Government's attention to the need to amend section 34 of Act No 107 of 1975 on Trade Unions, which does not provide for protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment. Moreover, the Committee had also referred to the absence of legal protection for public servants not engaged in the administration of the state, agricultural workers and seafarers, against acts of anti-union discrimination both at the time of recruitment and during the employment relationship.

The Committee notes that: (1) with respect to the absence of protection against acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment, the Government refers to its previous comments according to which discrimination at the time of recruitment is not possible as workers are mandatorily recruited and placed through official employment offices and trade union membership is not part of the criteria by which these employment offices place registered workers; (2) concerning the protection of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, agricultural workers and seafarers, at the time of recruitment and during the employment relationship, the Government indicates that these categories of workers have their own union (Unions of Administration Workers, Unions of Peasants and Breeders and Unions of Seafarers and Ports) that ensure the protection and defence of their rights; (3) the Government's indication that a draft new Labour Relations Act is being submitted to the Fundamental People's Congress for its promulgation. While taking due note of the Government's information on the national practice, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the new legislation to be adopted protects explicitly and through sufficiently dissuasive sanctions all workers (including public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, agricultural workers and seafarers) against all acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during the employment relationship, and requests the Government to indicate in its next report any steps taken or contemplated in this respect.

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining. The Committee previously referred to sections 63, 64, 65 and 67 of the Labour Code, which require the clauses of collective agreements to be in conformity with the national economic interest, thus violating the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements and the autonomy of the bargaining parties. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft Act on labour relations has repealed the abovementioned provisions and has redrafted them so as to give collective bargaining full scope taking into account the Committee's previous observation. The Committee notes this information with interest and requests the Government to indicate any development concerning the adoption of the draft law on labour relations.

The Committee had also referred to the absence of collective agreements covering public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, agricultural workers and seafarers. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's information that these workers enjoy the full right to bargain collectively and that the new draft Labour Code regulates collective bargaining at its various levels. In this regard, the Committee expresses the hope that the new draft Labour Code or any other legislation will expressly grant public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, agricultural workers and seafarers the right to bargain collectively and invites the Government to communicate any collective agreement in force concerning these categories of worker.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 29 August 2008, according to which the Government sets salaries unilaterally. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations thereon. The Committee also requests the Government to provide statistics on the number of collective agreements presently in force by sector, and the number of workers they cover.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1994)

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the 2006 comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned certain restrictions imposed on the exercise of the right to strike (sections 77, 78 and 80 of the Labour Code). The Committee notes that these legislative provisions have since then been amended and notes the text of the relevant amendments as entered into force on 1 July 2008. In this respect, the Committee wishes to raise the following points.

(a) Unilateral determination of minimum service. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 80(2) of the Labour Code so as to ensure that, in the event of disagreement among the parties to the collective labour dispute on the minimum service, the definition of the service to be ensured may be determined by an independent and impartial body. The Committee notes that according to the new amendment to subsection 2, the minimum services shall be determined by the parties to the collective dispute within three days from the day of submission of warning about the strike to the employer. The Committee notes, however, that, according to subsection 3, if no agreement is reached by the parties to the dispute, the decision shall be made by the Government or a municipal executive body upon consultation with the parties to the dispute. The Committee considers that it would be highly desirable for negotiations on the definition and organization of the minimum service not to be held during a labour dispute, so that all parties can examine the matter with the necessary objectivity and detachment (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 161). As regards the legal requirement that any disagreement on the minimum services shall be settled by the authorities, the Committee is of the opinion that the legislation should provide for any such disagreement to be settled by an independent body, and not by the Government or a municipal executive body. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 80(3) of the Labour Code accordingly and to indicate any progress made in this respect.

(b) Strike ballot. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 77(1) of the Labour Code so as to lower the quorum (set at two-thirds of the enterprise employees voting in favour of a strike at the enterprise; and two-thirds of employees of a structural subdivision of the enterprise and at least half of the employees of the enterprise voting in favour of a strike in the structural subdivision of the enterprise) and to ensure that, account it taken only of the votes cast. The Committee notes with interest that according the new amendment, the right to adopt a decision to declare a strike is vested in the trade union according to the procedure laid down in its regulations. If an enterprise has no operational trade union and the meeting of workers has not conveyed the function of representation and protection of workers to a trade union of relevant economic branch, the labour council shall have to right to adopt a decision to declare a strike.

(c) Compensatory guarantees. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the manner in which claims of workers in essential services are settled and on the relevant body responsible for taking the final decision in this respect. The Committee notes that, by virtue of the recent amendments, strikes are prohibited in first aid medical services and the demands put forward by the workers concerned are settled by the Government upon consultation with the parties to the collective labour dispute (section 78). The Committee recalls in this respect that if the right to strike is subject to restrictions or a prohibition, workers who are thus deprived of an essential means of defending their socio-economic and occupational interests should be afforded compensatory guarantees, for example conciliation and mediation procedures leading, in the event of deadlock, to arbitration machinery seen to be reliable by the parties concerned. It is essential that the latter be able to participate in determining and implementing the procedure, which should furthermore provide sufficient guarantees of impartiality and rapidity (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 164). The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend section 78(1) accordingly and to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

(d) Strikes in nuclear facilities. With respect to the Committee's previous request to provide information on any use of section 199(4) of the Criminal Code providing for criminal liability for strikes at nuclear facilities, the Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the Criminal Code of 1961 became invalid on 1 May 2003 and that the Criminal Code of 2000 (in force as of 1 May 2003) does not criminalize strikes at nuclear facilities.

Madagascar

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

In its previous comments, the Committee noted the observations made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) in 2006 concerning cases of interference by the authorities in trade union matters, repression of trade unionists who participated in strikes in the public service and impediments to the right to strike in the maritime sector. In its reply, the Government indicates that, with regard to the trade union leader dismissed by the University of Antananarivo for leaving his post, the latter was subject to a disciplinary measure as he did not want to return to his former post following a temporary appointment at the Ministry of the Public Service, Labour and Social Legislation. It was merely a penalty against a public employee who had failed in his professional duties and not a measure against a trade unionist. With regard to disputes in the maritime sector, the Government indicates that it organized a round-table meeting between the parties to the dispute prior to an investigation of the alleged anti-union acts, further to the recommendations of the Committee of Freedom of Association (Case No. 2391). The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report the findings of the independent investigation into discriminatory practices in the maritime sector and any action taken on these findings.

The Committee notes the comments dated 29 August 2008 of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning legislative matters already raised by the Committee in its previous comments, restrictions on the exercise of freedom of association in export processing zones, the risks of anti-union discrimination under a Decree of 2000 requiring trade unions, among other measures, to provide the list of their members, and interference by the authorities in the appointment of worker representatives to tripartite bodies. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in reply to the ITUC's comments.

Legislative matters. Furthermore, in its previous comments, the Committee noted that Act No. 2003-044 of 28 July 2004 issuing the Labour Code did not take into account the Committee's comments on several issues of non-conformity with the Convention.

Article 2 of the Convention. Workers governed by the Maritime Code. The Committee noted previously that the Labour Code maintains the exclusion from its scope of workers governed by the Maritime Code, and that the Maritime Code does not contain sufficiently clear and precise provisions ensuring the right of the workers to whom it applies to establish and join trade unions, as well as the related rights. It requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that this right is recognized by the legislation and to indicate any measure taken or envisaged in this regard. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the Maritime Code of 2000 is under revision, that a draft new Code was presented in August 2008 during a workshop and that the draft text includes new provisions guaranteeing seafarers the right to establish and join unions, as well as all the related rights. The Committee notes these indications and requests the Government to provide a copy of the new Maritime Code once it has been adopted.

Article 3. Representativeness of workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee noted previously that section 137 of the Labour Code provides that the representativeness of employers' and workers' organizations participating in social dialogue at the national level "shall be established with the elements provided by the concerned organizations and the labour administration". It indicated that, in order to avoid any interference by the public authorities in the decision regarding the representativeness of occupational organizations, this decision has to be made by an independent body having the confidence of the parties according to a procedure that offers full guarantees of impartiality. The Committee finally noted that a draft Decree on trade unions and representativeness had been submitted to the National Labour Council for discussion. The Government indicates that the draft text in question was not adopted unanimously and that discussions are still continuing on the matter. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any further developments in its next report.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee noted previously that, under sections 220 and 225 of the Labour Code, in the event of the failure of mediation, the collective dispute shall be submitted by the ministry responsible for labour and social legislation either to a contractual arbitration procedure, in conformity with the collective agreement between the parties, or to the arbitration procedure of the competent labour court. The arbitration award is final and without appeal and brings an end to the dispute, including any strike that has been called in the meantime. In this respect, the Committee emphasized that recourse to compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute is only acceptable if it is at the request of both parties involved in the dispute and/or in the case of disputes in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. It indicated that, with the exception of cases in which it is derived from an agreement between the two parties, an arbitration procedure which gives rise to a final decision bringing an end to a strike constitutes, in sectors other than essential services, interference by the public authorities in the activities of trade unions, in conflict with Article 3 of the Convention. Finally, it requested the Government to take all the necessary measures to amend the respective provisions of the Labour Code. The Government merely indicates that in the event of the failure of mediation it is the responsibility of the mediator (labour inspector or the ministry responsible for labour) to submit the dispute to arbitration. It adds that in certain cases the presence of the authorities in the settlement of disputes is requested by the employer to accelerate the procedure. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the provisions of the Labour Code so as to ensure that recourse to arbitration to bring an end to a collective labour dispute can only be decided upon at the request of both parties and/or in the case of a strike in essential services in the strict sense of the term, that is in services the interruption of which would endanger the life, health or personal safety of the whole or part of the population. Accordingly, the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes without interference by the public authorities, including the exercise of the right to strike in sectors other than essential services, would be respected in accordance with Article 3.

Requisitioning. The Committee noted previously that section 228 of the Labour Code provides that the right to strike "may only be limited by requisitioning in case of the disruption of public order or where the strike would endanger the life, safety and health of the whole or part of the population". The Committee indicated that the reference to cases of "acute national crisis", rather than to the notion of the disruption of public order, would better reflect the position of the ILO supervisory bodies and would moreover lead to the repeal of section 21 of the Act No. 69-15 of 15 December 1969, which provides for the possibility of requisitioning workers in the event of the proclamation of a state of national necessity. Noting the Government's indication that it has taken due note of its comments, the Committee trusts that the Government will soon report measures to formally amend section 228 of the Labour Code and Act No. 69-15, referred to above, in accordance with the principals recalled in this respect.

Sanctions in the event of strike action. The Committee noted previously that, under the terms of section 258 of the Labour Code, the "instigators and leaders of illegal strikes" shall be punished with a fine and/or imprisonment. The Committee recalls that it should only be possible to impose disciplinary sanctions for strike action in cases where the prohibitions in question are in conformity with the principles of freedom of association and that such sanctions should not be disproportionate to the seriousness of the violations. Nothing that the Government has taken due note of its comments, the Committee requests it to ensure that no penalty of imprisonment nor any other penal sanction may be imposed on workers or trade unionists who organize or participate in a peaceful strike. It requests the Government to indicate any measure adopted in this respect.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2008, which refer to legislative matters already raised by the Committee in its previous comments, to the fact that trade union rights do not apply to workers in essential services, which include the radio and television broadcasting sectors and the banking sector, and to the absence of social dialogue in the mining sector and export processing zones. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in reply to the observations of the ITUC.

Article 4 of the Convention. Determining representativeness. In its previous comments, referring to section 183 of the Labour Code which establishes a number of criteria for determining the representativeness of organizations of employers and workers, the Committee noted the Government's indication that a draft decree on trade unions and representativeness had been sent to the National Labour Council for debate. In its report, the Government indicates that the draft could not be adopted due to a lack of unanimous support and that discussions are still being held on the matter. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any developments in this regard and to provide a copy of any text adopted.

Promotion of collective bargaining. Referring to the provisions of the Labour Code on collective bargaining, the Committee previously noted that the Labour Code protects, above all, collective bargaining in enterprises with more than 50 workers. It asked the Government to promote collective bargaining in small and medium-sized enterprises. The Government indicates in its report that no provision actually mentions the compulsory nature of bargaining for enterprises with fewer than 50 workers, but that such bargaining should not give rise to problems since it is in the workers' interest. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to promote collective bargaining in enterprises employing fewer than 50 workers as well as on the collective agreements concluded in these enterprises.

Article 6. Collective bargaining for seafarers and public servants. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Labour Code excludes public servants and maritime workers from its scope and asked the Government once again to take the necessary steps to ensure the adoption of specific provisions on the collective bargaining rights of seafarers governed by the Maritime Code and of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the Maritime Code of 2000 is in the process of being revised, that a draft new Code was presented in August 2008 at a workshop, and that this draft includes new provisions guaranteeing the right of seafarers to establish and join trade unions and all related rights. The Committee notes this information with interest and trusts that the draft new Maritime Code will provide that the rights guaranteed by the Convention are extended to seafarers. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the new Maritime Code as soon as it is adopted.

With regard to the right of collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, the Government indicates that these persons are governed by Act No. 94-025 of 17 November 1994 on the general conditions of service of contractual public employees, and also by Decrees Nos 64-213 and 64-214 of 27 May 1964, except for those provisions which have been repealed by the Act of 1994. These public servants are connected to the public bodies which employ them only by a precarious contractual link which may be revoked in circumstances arising from the labour regulations and from the provisions of the Act. The general labour regulations therefore apply by extension where other texts concerning these persons are not applied. In any case, the Committee holds the view that the situation as described by the Government is likely to create uncertainty with regard to the legal framework applicable and may therefore hinder the development of collective bargaining within the meaning of the Convention and other trade union activities. The Committee therefore requests the Government to adopt, without delay, formal provisions clearly recognizing the protection of all public servants and public sector employees not engaged in the administration of the State against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference and their right to bargain collectively on their conditions of employment.

The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary steps in the near future to ensure that the guarantees of the Convention apply to all public servants and public sector employees not engaged in the administration of the State and will give an account of any progress made in this regard in its next report. The Committee requests the Government to provide any collective agreement concluded in the public sector.

The Committee is examining the matter of compulsory arbitration when mediation fails in its observation on the application of Convention No. 87.

Malawi

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008. The ITUC's comments mainly refer to matters previously raised by the Committee on the right to strike.

In its previous comments, the Committee, noting that sections 45(3) and 47(2) of the Labour Relations Act empower the parties concerned to apply to the Industrial Relations Court for a determination as to whether a particular strike involves an essential service, had requested the Government to provide information on any strike declared illegal and the reasons therefore, as well as on any decisions rendered by the Industrial Relations Court under these sections of the Labour Relations Act. The Government indicates in this regard that the procedures set out in the Labour Relations Act concerning strike action are often not followed by unions, which leads to many strikes being declared illegal, and adds that, with international assistance, it has intensified tripartite discussion on, among other things, the issue of illegal strikes. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on any strike declared illegal and the reasons therefore, as well as on any decisions rendered by the Industrial Relations Court, under sections 45(3) and 47(2) of the Labour Relations Act.

A request concerning other points is being addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008 concerning the application of the Convention in the informal sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Malaysia

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 29 August 2008, according to which the Government in the National Labour Advisory Council (tripartite body) did not consult with the labour movement with regard to the tabling of the Industrial Relations (Amendment) Bill 2007 which restricts union rights in the process of recognition by the employer (i.e. the secret ballot of workers to be undertaken allows the employer to manipulate the size of the bargaining unit for the purpose of the election, etc.). The Committee notes that the Government refers to tripartite consultation concerning the Bill; thus, it requests the Government to submit detailed observations to permit it to examine the Bill's conformity with the Convention and to provide a copy of the Bill once adopted.

The Committee notes the comments by the ITUC reiterating issues previously raised by the Committee regarding long delays in the treatment of union claims to obtain recognition for collective bargaining purposes. The Committee notes that, according to the 2006 Government report, the cause of the delay is mainly due to the time taken by legal proceedings lodged either by trade unions or an employer against the decision of the Director-General of Trade Unions (DGTU) on issues of competency or membership verifications. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the Bill is shortening the timeframe for recognition of trade unions. The Committee requests the Government to submit more precise information on the ITUC's comments in the light of the provisions of the Bill and to indicate the average duration of proceedings for the recognition of a union, as well as the requirements for obtaining recognition.

The Committee notes the Government's statement about the comments previously made by the ITUC with regard to the inefficiency of labour courts concerning the application of the provisions of the Convention. The Government indicated that: (1) efforts are made to further increase the number of Industrial Court chairmen who will be assigned to deal with cases in designated areas; (2) recently implemented and computerized case management in the Court will help the Court President to monitor more closely cases in the courts; and (3) this process is supposed to expedite the issuance of awards. On this matter, the Committee notes the ITUC's comments that the Government failed to apply any sanctions against employers who opposed the directives of the authorities granting trade union recognition or who have refused to comply with Industrial Court orders to reinstate unlawfully dismissed workers. The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations on these matters.

Restrictions on collective bargaining for certain categories of worker. The Committee had urged the Government to repeal section 15 of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA), which limited the scope of collective agreements for companies granted “pioneer status”, for instance with respect to election campaigns. The Committee notes with satisfaction the deletion of section 15 of the IRA due to the amendment of the aforementioned legislation.

The Committee notes that, according to the ITUC, 2.6 million migrant workers in Malaysia are prevented by law from organizing or applying to register a trade union and are barred from serving as officers of a trade union. The ITUC adds that the system for registering migrant workers discourages them from asserting their rights because it grants total discretion to employers to terminate workers for virtually any reason. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, foreign and local workers enjoy equal rights; migrant workers can join a union but cannot be elected as trade union officers. Recalling that workers, including migrant workers, should enjoy the right to elect their representatives freely, the Committee requests the Government to communicate its observations on the exercise of trade union rights by migrant workers in law and in practice.

Scope of collective bargaining. The Committee had previously urged the Government to amend the legislation so as to bring section 13(3) of the IRA, which contains restrictions on collective bargaining with regard to transfer, dismissal and reinstatement (some of the matters known as “internal management prerogatives”), into full conformity with Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Bill amends section 13 by inserting three subject matters in a proposal for a collective agreement (training to enhance skills and knowledge of the workmen; annual review of the wage system; and a performance-based remuneration system). The Committee notes that according to the Government: (1) section 13(3) of the IRA is not intended to limit collective bargaining, but rather to provide for the right of employers to run their business in the most efficient way and to protect from abuse of the collective bargaining process; (2) these requirements are not absolute and matters relating to them may be brought to the Industrial Relations Department and, if no settlement is reached, the matter may be referred to the Industrial Court for adjudication; and (3) in matters concerning transfers, parties are allowed to discuss the procedures for promotion of a general character. The Committee underlines that section 13 of the IRA restricts the scope of negotiable matters. The Committee reiterates therefore that measures taken unilaterally by the authorities to restrict the scope of negotiable issues are often incompatible with the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 250) and once again requests the Government to amend section 13(3) of the IRA so as to remove these restrictions on collective bargaining matters. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether there are any judicial decisions by the Industrial Court on this point and, if so, to transmit copies of the same in its next report.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee notes that section 26(2) of the IRA allows compulsory arbitration, by the Minister of Labour of his own motion even in case of failure of collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that arbitration imposed by the authorities at the request of one party is generally contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements established in the Convention, and thus the autonomy of bargaining partners (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 257). Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure that the legislation only authorizes compulsory arbitration in essential services in the strict sense of the term, for public servants engaged in the administration of the State or in cases of acute national crisis.

Restrictions on collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide information on the possibility of collective bargaining under the auspices of the National Joint Council and the Departmental Joint Council.

The Committee notes that the Government states that: (1) it has its own forum, i.e. the National Joint Council and the Department Joint Council, to discuss grievances in the public sector and to consider any suggestions to improve terms and conditions of employment of public servants; (2) the outcomes of consultations pertaining to salaries and remuneration are subject to the decision of the Cabinet Committee on Establishment and Salaries of Employees in the Public Sector, and are to be tabled and legislated in Parliament; and (3) it maintains its position of not recognizing the right to collective bargaining of public servant unions not engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee recalls that, while the principle of autonomy of the parties to collective bargaining is valid as regards public servants covered by the Convention, the special characteristics of the public service require some flexibility in its application. Thus, legislative provisions allowing Parliament or the competent budgetary authority to set upper and lower limits for wage negotiations, or to establish an overall “budgetary package”, within which the parties may negotiate monetary or standard-setting clauses (i.e. reduction of working hours, varying wage increases according to levels of remuneration), are compatible with the Convention, provided they leave a significant role to collective bargaining (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 261–264). The Committee considers that simple consultation with unions of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State do not meet the requirements of Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State the right to bargain collectively over wages and remuneration and other employment conditions.

Mali

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the observations of 29 August 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention in practice which refer in particular to the requisitioning of airport services during a general strike in June 2007. In its reply of October 2008, the Government denies the use of requisitioning in airport services or any other sector.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations to formulate their programmes without interference from the public authorities. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled the need to amend section L.229 of the 1992 Labour Code in order to limit the power of the Minister of Labour to resort to arbitration to end strikes liable to cause an acute national crisis. This provision allows the Minister of Labour to refer some disputes to compulsory arbitration, not only where they involve essential services the interruption of which is likely to endanger the life, personal safety or health of the population, but also where the dispute is liable to "jeopardize the normal operation of the national economy or involves a vital industrial sector". The Committee notes that in its report, the Government states that a draft amendment has been prepared and is to be submitted to the Higher Labour Council. The Committee trusts that the Higher Labour Council will shortly examine the draft amendment of section L.229 to bring this provision into line with the Convention. It asks the Government to indicate in its next report any progress made in this regard.

The Committee's previous comments also addressed the matter of Decree No. 90-562 P-RM of 22 December 1990 establishing the list of services, positions and categories of workers strictly indispensable to the maintenance of a minimum service in the event of a strike in the public service, which had not been submitted for consultation to the social partners at the preparation stage and which was inconsistent with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee notes the information that a draft revision of the Decree is being prepared in consultation with the social partners. The Committee trusts that the draft revision of Decree No. 90-562 P-RM of 22 December 1990 will be adopted shortly, in consultation with the social partners concerned. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any new developments in this regard.

Malta

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government, pursuant to comments by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) dated 10 August 2006, alleging death threats against leaders of the General Workers Union (GWU), to conduct an inquiry into these allegations and to provide information on the result. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in its next report concerning these allegations.

The Committee also once again requests the Government to send its observations on the comments made by the ICFTU in 2006 with regard to suspensions of strikers, freezing of union assets and suits filed against unions following industrial action.

Article 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to clarify whether sections 74 and 75 of the Employment and Industrial Relations Act 2002, continue to impose compulsory arbitration over disputes of interest – just like the repealed Industrial Relations Act, 1976 – or whether the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunal (under section 75(1) of the Act) is now limited to disputes of rights only. The Committee had also requested information on the number of strikes and the incidents of recourse to the Minister's power to refer disputes to the Industrial Tribunal at the request of only one party. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any information on these points.

The Committee had noted the Government's reply to the request previously addressed to it with regard to the resolution of eight strikes held in 2003, to the effect that all of them were resolved through mediation by the authorities and not through recourse to the Industrial Tribunal.

The Committee recalls once again that restrictions on strike action through a compulsory arbitration procedure seriously limit the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members and are acceptable only in cases of essential services in the strict sense of the term, or public employees exercising authority in the name of the State, and at the request of both parties. The Committee once again asks the Government to clarify whether the Industrial Tribunal's jurisdiction is limited to questions arising from disputes of right, or whether it is also entitled to hear disputes of interest and issue binding decisions thereon and, if so, to take the necessary measures to amend sections 74 and 75 of the Employment and Industrial Relations Act 2002, so as to ensure that compulsory arbitration may be imposed only in cases of essential services in the strict sense of the term and public employees exercising authority in the name of the State.

[The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.]

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to clarify the procedures for the examination of allegations of anti-union dismissals by public officers, port workers and public transport workers given that these categories of workers are excluded from the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunal pursuant to section 75(1) of the Employment and Industrial Relations Act 2002 (EIRA). Noting with regret that the Government's report does not provide information in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the procedures applicable for the examination of allegations of anti-union dismissals by public officers, port workers and public transport workers.

Articles 2 and 3. Protection against acts of interference. In its previous comments, the Committee had observed that the EIRA did not expressly protect employers' and workers' organizations from acts of interference by one another, nor did it provide for a rapid and effective appeals procedure or sanctions in the case of breach as is required to ensure compatibility with the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 232). While noting the Government's indication that section 2 of the EIRA includes in the definition of "trade dispute" a dispute between "employers and workers" and "workers and workers", so that, if an act of interference is alleged, any one of the parties can refer the matter to the industrial tribunal, the Committee notes that there is no explicit prohibition of acts of interference in the EIRA. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to introduce in the legislation an explicit prohibition of acts of interference, as well as sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2447 with regard to the need to amend section 6 of the National Holidays and Other Public Holidays Act so as to ensure that this provision: (i) does not render automatically null and void any provisions in existing collective agreements which grant workers the right to recover public holidays falling on a Saturday or Sunday; and (ii) does not preclude voluntary negotiations in the future over the issue of granting workers the right to recover national or public holidays which fall on a Saturday or Sunday on the basis of a collective agreement (see 34th Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, paragraph 752). Noting that the Government's report does not contain any information in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section 6 of the National Holidays and Other Public Holidays Act.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate whether collective bargaining with trade unions representing less than 50 per cent of employees is possible, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee takes due note of the Government's report according to which nothing in the law precludes employers from negotiating with unions representing less than 50 per cent of employees.

In its previous observations, the Committee had noted with concern that section 74 of the EIRA entitles the Minister to refer an unresolved trade dispute to the industrial tribunal at the request of one party and that the industrial tribunal's decision in this matter will be binding. The Committee had also noted that, pursuant to section 80 of the EIRA, in its capacity to decide trade disputes, the industrial tribunal is obliged to take into consideration the Government's social and economic policies and plans. The Committee recalls that, except in the case of public servants engaged in the administration of the State or essential services in the strict sense of the term, it is generally contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements established in the Convention, and thus the autonomy of the bargaining parties, for binding arbitration to be imposed by the authorities at the request of one party (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 257). The Committee points out an observation to the Government on this point under Convention No. 87.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Mauritania

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee previously asked the Government to reply to the observations of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, dated 10 August 2006, relating to problems in giving effect to the Convention in practice (registration applications blocked at the Office of the Public Prosecutor and pressure from the public authorities in favour of a trade union organization). The Committee notes that, in its reply, the Government refutes the observations made by the ICFTU concerning the blocking of trade union registrations at the Office of the Public Prosecutor and points out, as an example, the recent registration (March 2008) of a tenth trade union confederation. The Committee also notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2008, which relate to legislative matters already raised by the Committee.

In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to take the necessary measures to amend its legislation so as to bring it into full conformity with the Convention.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, without previous authorization. The Committee previously asked the Government to amend section 269 of the Labour Code in order to remove any obstacles that prevent minors who have access to the labour market from exercising the right to organize. In its reply, the Government maintains that parental authorization was deemed necessary to protect minors and that this position does not contradict the provisions of the Convention. The Committee is bound to recall that, under Article 2 of the Convention, the minimum age for joining a trade union in full freedom must be the same as that established for admission to employment, without the permission of the parents or guardian being necessary. The Committee therefore trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures without delay to amend section 269 of the Labour Code in order to guarantee the right to organize of minors who are of the minimum legal age for admission to employment (14 years according to section 153 of the Labour Code), whether as workers or as apprentices, without the permission of their parents or guardians being necessary.

Furthermore, the Committee has been making comments for several years on the need to ensure the exercise of freedom of association of magistrates. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that magistrates are not allowed to set up trade union organizations but may form neutral associations for the defence of their material and moral interests. In this regard, the Committee is bound to recall that magistrates are not covered by the exceptions allowed by Article 9 of the Convention and that they ought to enjoy, like all other categories of workers, the right to establish and join trade unions of their own choosing, in accordance with Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee therefore trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures without delay to ensure that magistrates enjoy the right to establish and join occupational organizations of their own choosing and will indicate all measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom and to organize their administration and activities without interference from the public authorities. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 278 of the Labour Code extends the procedure for the establishment of trade unions to any changes in their administration or management, and therefore has the effect of subjecting such changes to the approval, either of the Prosecutor-General or of the courts. The Committee indicated that this provision therefore gives rise to serious risks of interference by the public authorities in the organization and activities of trade unions and their federations. It recalled that the establishment or amendment of the statutes of an organization of workers is the responsibility of the organization itself and should not be subject to the prior consent of the public authorities in order to take effect. It therefore asked the Government to amend section 278 of the Labour Code so as to provide that any change in the administration or management of a union may take effect as soon as the competent authorities have been notified and without the requirement of their approval.

Compulsory arbitration. In its previous comments, the Committee observed that sections 350 and 362 of the Labour Code allow compulsory arbitration in instances which go beyond essential services in the strict sense and in situations which cannot be deemed to constitute an acute national crisis. The Committee recalled that the prohibition or restriction of the right to strike by means of compulsory arbitration can be justified only in the cases of: (1) essential services in the strict sense of the term, that is, services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population; (2) an acute national crisis, and then only for a limited period and to the extent necessary to meet the requirements of the situation. The Committee therefore asked the Government to amend the relevant sections of the Labour Code so as to limit the prohibition on strikes by means of compulsory arbitration only to essential services in the strict sense of the term and to situations of acute national crisis.

Duration of mediation. In its previous comments concerning the prohibition on strikes for the duration of the mediation procedure established under section 362 of the Labour Code, the Committee recalled that it was possible to require the exhaustion of conciliation and mediation procedures before a strike may be called, on condition that the procedures are not so complex or slow that a lawful strike becomes impossible in practice or loses its effectiveness. However, the Committee considered that the maximum period of 120 days for mediation provided for in section 346 of the Labour Code was too long. The Committee therefore asked the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to amend section 346 of the Labour Code.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that activities have recently been carried out with technical support from the Office aimed at validating various draft texts implementing the Labour Code. It adds that the amendments requested to the sections of the Labour Code which are the subject of comments by the Committee (sections 278, 350–362, 346, etc.) could be examined in the process under way of revising the texts implementing the Labour Code. The Committee notes these indications and hopes that the Government's next report will give an account of concrete progress made in the revision of the Labour Code (through the adoption of implementing texts or any other measures) to bring it into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee trusts that the Government will take due account of all the points raised and hopes that the technical assistance provided to the Government by the Office will continue with regard to these matters.

The Committee is addressing a direct request to the Government on other matters.

Mauritius

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2005)

The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Employment Relations Act 2008 (ERA) which, once proclaimed, will replace the Industrial Relations Act 1973 (IRA). The Committee notes that the ERA contains significant improvements in relation to the freedom of association provisions of the IRA, by recognizing among other things the right to organize of firefighters and prison officers and largely abolishing the discretionary powers of the registrar over the establishment and activities of trade unions. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report progress made with regard to the proclamation of the ERA and to transmit the relevant text as soon as it enters into force.

The Committee also notes that certain discrepancies remain between some provisions of the ERA and the Convention, especially in relation to the mechanism for the resolution of industrial disputes. The Committee examines these issues in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee further takes note of the comments of the Federation of Parastatal Bodies and other Unions (FPBOU) transmitted with the Government's report, as well as the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008, concerning the application of the Convention. In particular, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to the following issues raised by the ITUC.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to organize. The Committee notes the serious issues raised by the ITUC with regard to the vulnerability of migrant workers to trade union rights violations and the specific cases mentioned by the ITUC as an illustration of coordinated action by the Government and employers in order to send (mostly women) migrant workers back to their country of origin on the grounds of "breach of contract" for having staged a strike. The ITUC also refers to hostility to trade unions by employers in the export processing zones (EPZs) and difficulties to make contact with migrant workers as trade unionists do not have access to the workplace; as a result, union density in the EPZs is below 12 per cent. The Committee takes note of the Government's reply according to which the work stoppages to which the ITUC refers were all illegal strikes as a result of which certain workers were repatriated by their employer. The Government adds that migrant workers have the same rights as other workers and regular inspection visits are carried out at workplaces where migrant workers are employed.

The Committee recalls that in a previous direct request it had requested the Government to provide statistical information on the unionization levels of migrant workers in the EPZs and offshore companies. It notes that according to the Government, section 13 of the ERA provides that any non-citizen shall be entitled to be a member of a trade union provided they hold a work permit. According to the Government, it is difficult to provide statistical information on the unionization levels of migrant workers in the EPZs and offshore companies, since there is no specific trade union catering exclusively for migrant workers and they are free to join any trade union of their choice. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken in order to guarantee migrant workers their trade union rights both in law and in practice. The Committee notes that an appropriate measure in this regard could be to allow for the organization of awareness-raising activities in the EPZs to apprise migrant workers of the advantages of unionization. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures for the collection of data on unionization levels of migrant workers in the EPZs and offshore companies.

The Committee further notes that the ITUC refers in its comments to the prosecution of the President of the Fédération des Syndicats du Service Civil (FSSC) and the President of the Government Servants Association (GSA), for contravening the Public Gathering Act. The Committee notes that this issue is currently under examination by the Committee on Freedom of Association in the framework of Case No. 2616 and the Government has been requested to facilitate a speedy resolution of this case which is pending on appeal, and raise with the competent authorities the possibility of giving a favourable review to this matter (351st Report, paragraphs 990–1015).

The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Employment Relations Act, 2008 (ERA) which, once proclaimed, will replace the Industrial Relations Act 1973 (IRA) and introduce provisions against acts of interference as well as measures for the promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the progress made with regard to the proclamation of the ERA and to transmit the relevant text as soon as it enters into force.

The Committee also takes note of the comments of the Federation of Parastatal Bodies and other Unions (FPBOU) transmitted with the Government's report, as well as the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008 concerning the application of the Convention.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee takes note of the comments made by the FPBOU with regard to the prevalence of anti-union discrimination in the textile sector, especially vis-à-vis migrant workers. The FPBOU also refers to obstacles faced by unions in meeting workers inside or even outside the work premises. Finally, reference is made to the need to review the EPZ Act. The Committee notes from the Government's report that it is an offence under the law to dismiss or discriminate against a migrant worker on trade union grounds and that regular visits to EPZs are carried out by the Ministry of Labour. The Committee requests the Government to reply in detail to the comments made by the FPBOU.

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to adopt legislation providing for protection against acts of interference. The Committee notes from the Government's report that sections 30 and 33 of the ERA prohibit acts of interference in the establishment, functioning or administration of a workers' or employers' organization. They also prohibit the practice of promoting or giving assistance to a trade union with the objective of placing it or maintaining it under the employer's control. In its previous comments, the Committee had expressed the hope that in addition to the prohibition of acts of interference, the ERA would make provision for rapid appeals procedures, coupled with sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, in order to provide full and effective protection. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the provisions of the ERA which establish rapid appeals procedures, coupled with sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts.

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee had previously commented on the low rate of collective bargaining in export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee notes that according to the Government, the ERA contains measures to encourage collective bargaining in line with Article 4. The Committee regrets that the Government makes no reference to specific measures to promote collective bargaining in EPZs, as it had previously requested. It once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the concrete measures undertaken to promote collective bargaining in the specific sector of the EPZs.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to transmit its observations on comments made by the ITUC concerning restrictions on the right to negotiate salaries in the public sector. The Government indicates that the Committee on Freedom of Association enquired into a complaint made by the Mauritius Labour Congress with regard to legislative amendments adopted in June 2003 restricting the right of the Public Service Unions to declare a dispute in relation to remuneration or allowances of any kind (Case No. 2398), and that in its 338th Report, the CFA concluded that the complaint did not call for further examination. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information in its next report on the practice followed in 2007-2008 with regard to negotiations over salaries in the public sector.

The Committee also notes the comments dated 16 May 2007 by the National Trade Union Confederation (NTUC) with regard to the setting up of a National Pay Council (NPC) by the Government in a way which bypassed the right of workers' representatives to be chosen freely by their respective trade union organizations. The Committee notes that the issue is treated by the Committee on Freedom of Association in the framework of Case No. 2575 and that in its latest examination of this Case, the Committee on Freedom of Association requested the Government to continue to hold full and frank consultations with the representatives of the social partners whose representativeness has been objectively proven, on ways to improve the composition and functioning of the NPC. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the progress made in these consultations and their outcome.

Mexico

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1950)

The Committee notes the comments of 29 August 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to: (1) serious acts of violence against, and the arbitrary arrests of trade unionists; (2) the difficulties in organizing and joining unions due to collective protection contracts and exclusion clauses in the electronics industry; and (3) the denial of the right to organize to workers recruited under service provision contracts and other types of precarious contract. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these matters.

Article 2 of the Convention. Trade union monopoly in government agencies imposed by the Federal Act on State Employees and by an Act regulating the Constitution. The Committee points out that it has been commenting for many years on the following provisions:

- (i) the prohibition of the coexistence of two or more unions in the same state agency (sections 68, 71, 72 and 73 of the Federal Act on State Employees);
- (ii) the ban on trade unionists leaving the union of which they have become members (an exclusion clause under which trade unionists who leave the union lose their jobs) (section 69 of the Federal Act on State Employees);
- (iii) the ban on unions of public servants joining trade union organizations of workers or rural workers (section 79 of the Federal Act on State Employees);
- (iv) the extension of the restrictions applying to trade unions in general to the Single Federation of Unions of State Employees (section 84 of the Federal Act on State Employees); and
- (v) the imposition by law of the trade union monopoly of the National Federation of Banking Unions (section 23 of the Act to regulate article 123(XIIIbis)(B), of the Constitution).

The Committee notes that in its report the Government: (1) reiterates, in response to (i) above, that the right of state employees to organize freely is guaranteed by article 123(X)(B), of the Constitution which lays down the right of workers to associate in order to defend their common interests and use to the right to strike when the rights laid down in this provision are violated generally and systematically; (2) again reiterates, in response to (ii) above, that pursuant to jurisprudential ruling No. 43/1999 issued by the Supreme Court of Justice, the Federal Conciliation and Arbitration Tribunal upheld the resignations of workers from membership of various unions and the applications for membership of others; and (3) states that three legislative proposals have recently been submitted on freedom of association (the first consists of a bill to amend and supplement various provisions of the Political Constitution, the Federal Labour Act and the Federal Act on State Employees, which gives constitutional rank to the election of trade union executive committees; a second amendment, inter alia, of sections 68, 69, 71, 72, 78 and 79 of the Federal Act on State Employees; and a third reform supplementing or repealing several provisions of the Federal Labour Act and the Federal Act on State Employees and promoting trade union pluralism and abolition of the trade union exclusion clause).

At a general level, the Committee wishes to emphasize that any system of trade union unity or monopoly imposed directly or indirectly by law is at odds with the principle of full freedom for workers and employers to establish organizations laid down in Article 2 of the Convention. It points out that in drafting the Convention, the intent of the International Labour Conference was not to impose trade union pluralism of a compulsory nature but to ensure at least the possibility of establishing various organizations. There is thus a fundamental difference between trade union monopoly which is established and maintained by law and a single organization which is the result of a decision taken freely by the workers or their trade unions and not the implementation of a law adopted for the purpose. As the Committee has already pointed out, it is not necessarily incompatible with the Convention for legislation to establish a distinction between the most representative trade union organization and other trade union organizations, provided that this distinction amounts to no more than the recognition of certain rights to the most representative trade union (particularly with regard to representation for the purposes of collective bargaining or consultation by governments). But to allow such a distinction on no account implies that the existence of other trade unions which some of the workers wish to join may be prohibited. The Committee notes with interest the various parliamentary initiatives to harmonize the legislation with the Convention.

In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend sections 68, 69, 71, 72, 73, 79 and 84 of the Federal Act on State Employees and section 23 of the Act to regulate article 123(XIIIbis)(B) of the Constitution so as to bring them fully into line with the Convention and the abovementioned jurisprudential ruling. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the progress of the abovementioned legislative proposals in parliament and expresses the firm hope that any amendment of the legislation will take account of the comments it has been making for years.

Article 3. Ban on re-election in trade unions (section 75 of the Federal Act on State Employees). The Committee notes that the Government again states that the Federal Conciliation and Arbitration Tribunal applies ruling no. CXXVII/2000 of the Supreme Court of Justice establishing that section 75 of the Federal Act on State Employees which prohibits the re-election of trade union leaders is in breach of freedom of association laid down in article 123 of the Constitution and that the Court recognizes re-election where it is allowed by the statutes of the trade union. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to amend section 75 of the Federal Act on State Employees to align it with the case law of the Supreme Court of Justice and bring it into conformity with the Convention and current practice.

Ban on foreign nationals being members of trade union executive bodies (section 372(II) of the Federal Labour Act). The Committee recalls that in an earlier observation it noted that a set of draft reforms to the Federal Labour Act had been prepared and submitted to parliament as a Bill on 12 December 2002. The Committee notes that the Government reports that the Bill was referred on 13 December 2007 to the Review Committee for study. The Committee expresses the hope that the amendments to the Federal Labour Act, including the amendment of section 372(II) will be implemented in the very near future and requests the Government to provide information on the matter in its next report.

Limited right to strike of public officials who do not exercise authority in the name of State. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on the following issues:

- (i) State employees – including workers in the banking sector – have the right to strike only if there is general and systematic violation of their rights (section 94, title 4, of the Federal Act on State Employees, and section 5 of the Act to regulate article 123(XIIIbis)(B) of the Constitution). The Committee notes that with regard to the banking sector, the Government states that the Act to Regulate the Banking and Loans Service (to which the Committee has not so far referred) has been repealed by the Credit Institutions Act. It is the Committee's view that State employees – including employees in the banking sector – who do not exercise authority in the name of the State should be able to exercise the right to strike where, even though there is no general and systematic violation of rights, the situation is nonetheless serious. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take steps to this end and to provide information on any amendments envisaged to the legislation.

The Committee likewise observes that section 121 of the Credit Institutions Act, referred to in the previous paragraph, establishes that the “National Banking Commission shall ensure that ... during the strike as many offices as are indispensable shall remain open and as many workers as are strictly necessary to perform the functions shall continue to work”. The Committee observes in this connection that the National Banking Commission is not tripartite. It reminds the Government that workers' organizations should be able to take part, should they so wish, in determining the minimum service to be maintained in the event of a strike, along with employers and the public authorities (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 161). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to this end and to indicate any developments in this regard.

- (ii) The Committee observes that section 99(II) of the Federal Act on State Employees lays down the requirement that in order to call a strike, two-thirds of the workers in the public body concerned must be in favour. The Committee notes that the Government states once again that the right to strike of public servants is not expressly established in the Convention, that the Committee has acknowledged that there may be a general ban on strikes in exceptional circumstances and that strikes may be regulated by provisions governing procedures and arrangements for carrying out strikes, and that the Federal Act on State Employees is accordingly in line with the provisions of the Convention. As regards workers who do not exercise authority in the name of the State, the Committee considers that the ballot method, the quorum and the majority required should not be such that exercise of the right to strike becomes very difficult, or even impossible in practice (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 170). In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 99(II) accordingly and to keep it informed on this matter.

Requisitioning. In its previous observation the Committee noted that several laws on the public service (Act to Regulate Railways, Act on the National Vehicle Register, Act on General Channels of Communication, and the Rules governing the Ministry of Communications and Transport) make provision for the requisitioning of staff where the national economy could be affected. The Committee notes that according to the Government, the Act on the National Vehicle Register was repealed by the Act on the Public Register of Vehicles of 1 September 2004 and that the Rules governing the Federal Telecommunications Commission have been replaced by new rules which took effect on 5 January 2006. The Committee observes that other laws and regulations not mentioned by the Government are still in force. It reminds the Government that the forced mobilization of workers on strike would be justified only for the purpose of ensuring the operation of essential services in the strict sense of the term (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 163). The Committee accordingly asks the Government once again to take steps to amend the provisions that do not refer to essential services in the strict sense of the term (such as the Act to Regulate Railways, the Act on General Channels of Communication) and the Rules governing the Ministry of Communications and Transport and to provide information in its next report on all measures taken to this end.

Republic of Moldova

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008 alleging obstacles to registration of trade union organizations, threats against a trade union leader and an attack of his home, and referring to the matters raised by the Committee and by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2317 (interference by the Government in trade union internal affairs). In respect of the allegation of the Government's interference, the Committee notes that the ITUC alleges that the merger of the ITUC-affiliated Confederation of Trade Unions of the Republic of Moldova (CSRM) and the trade union confederation Solidaritate was a result of pressure exerted by the Government. In this respect, the Committee notes that in Case No. 2317, the Committee on Freedom of Association took note of the merger agreement and while it deeply regretted that the Government failed to take steps to investigate the alleged acts of interference in the internal affairs of the CSRM and its affiliate organizations, it also regretted that none of the complainant organizations provided information on the merger and its impact on the CSRM and its affiliates. The Committee on Freedom of Association firmly requested the Government once again to instigate the necessary inquiries on all of the previous allegations (see 350th Report, paragraph 1418). The Committee on Freedom of Association will continue examining this matter in the framework of the follow-up of this case. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on the ITUC comments.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of employers and workers to form and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to keep it informed of developments regarding the draft bill amending the Law on Employers' Organizations, and in particular, its section 6, which required at least ten employers to create an employers' organization. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft amendment to section 6 of the Law, which would reduce the minimum membership requirement, was presented for coordination to the relevant bodies and social partners and will soon be submitted to the Government for approval. Considering that the requirement provided for in section 6 is too high and is likely to be an obstacle to the free establishment of employers' organizations, the Committee trusts that this section will soon be amended and requests the Government to indicate any progress made in this respect.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate whether primary trade unions and territorial sectoral and intersectoral trade unions, which are not affiliated to national sectoral and intersectoral trade unions, could be granted legal personality. The Committee notes the Government's indication that pursuant to section 10 of the Law on Trade Unions, primary trade union organizations may acquire the status of legal entity only if they are members of a national branch or national intersectoral trade union. The Committee therefore understands that all trade union organizations should belong to national trade union organizations. In the light of the recent controversial merger of the two national trade union centres into one, the Committee expresses its concern at the situation of factual monopoly where trade unions formed outside of the national structure would not be able to engage fully in the activities of defending and promoting the interests of their members. The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend section 10(5) of the Law on Trade Unions so as to guarantee the right of workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, including those outside of the existing national trade union structure and to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities. The Committee had previously noted that according to section 363(3) of the Labour Code, strikers are obliged "to provide uninterrupted functioning of the equipment and installations which, if stopped, could endanger the life and health of people or cause irreparable damage to the enterprise" and requested the Government to indicate the manner in which the workers under this section were determined. The Committee notes that according to the Government, the national legislation does not regulate the appointment of employees to provide the minimum service to ensure the continuous operation of equipment and facilities which, if stopped, could endanger the human life and health or could cause irrecoverable damage to the entity. The Committee points out that it is important that the provisions regarding the minimum services to be maintained in the event of a strike are established clearly, that they must be genuinely and exclusively minimum services and that the determination of minimum services and the minimum number of workers providing them should involve not only the public authorities, but also the relevant employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee therefore requests the Government to consider, in consultation with the social partners, the adoption of legislative provisions expressly providing for the participation of the relevant trade union and employers' organizations in determining the minimum services to be ensured in the event of a strike and to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee had previously noted that according to section 369 of the Labour Code, workers employed in communication services, employees of continuously working enterprises and workers of enterprises manufacturing products for the defensive needs of the country were prohibited from participating in strikes and had requested the Government to specify the workers concerned by the prohibition in section 369(2)(c) and (h) and to detail the "continuously working enterprises" in which the right to strike is prohibited. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the categories of employees who may not participate in a strike are exhaustively listed in the nomenclature approved by the Government's Decision No. 656 of 11 June 2004, the draft version of which was coordinated with all social partners and organizations at the national level. At the same time, the Government states its readiness to discuss this issue in order to find out the opinion of the social partners and to eventually submit proposals for the amendment of the Labour Code. The Committee requests the Government to transmit with its next report Decision No. 656 of 11 June 2004 providing for the list of categories of workers who are prohibited from striking, and to indicate any developments concerning discussions on this subject with the social partners.

In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that according to section 357(1) of the 2002 Criminal Code, an unlawful strike was punishable by a fine in the amount of 500 conventional units, or by unpaid labour for public benefit for the period from 100 to 240 hours, or by imprisonment for a period of up to three years, and that according to section 358(1), the organization of, or active participation in collective actions, breaking violently public order, related to the obstruction of the normal functioning of transport, enterprises, institutions and organizations shall be punished by the imposition of a fine in the amount of 500 conventional units, or by imprisonment for a period of up to three years. On that occasion, the Committee recalled that restrictions on the right to strike can only be imposed in essential services in the strict sense of the term and with respect to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and that disciplinary sanctions should be possible only where the prohibitions in question are in conformity with the principles of freedom of association. Furthermore, the Committee recalled that since the application of disproportionate penal sanctions did not favour the development of harmonious and stable industrial relations, if measures of imprisonment were to be imposed where violence against persons or property has been committed, they should be justified by the seriousness of the offences committed. In this respect, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to amend the abovementioned sections of the Criminal Code in accordance with the principle above. The Committee notes the Government's indication that over the last years, the courts have not heard cases of liability for organizing illegal strikes. In these circumstances, the Committee reiterates its previous request to take the necessary measures to amend sections 357(1) and 358(1) of the Criminal Code according to the abovementioned principles and requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1996)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference. The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008 alleging insufficient protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference in trade union affairs, the issues previously raised by the Committee. It further notes Case No. 2317 pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association, which requested the Government to actively consider, in full and frank consultations with social partners, legislative provisions expressly sanctioning violations of trade union rights and providing for sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference in trade union internal affairs (see 350th Report, paragraph 1422(b)).

The Committee recalls in this respect that it had previously noted the Government's indication that the Parliament was discussing the draft of the new Code on Contraventions which sought the introduction of a fine for obstruction of lawful activities of trade unions and their bodies by high-level civil servants. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the new Code on Contraventions was adopted on 24 October 2008. Section 61 of the Code provides for the application of fines in the amount of 40 to 50 conventional units (one unit equals 20 MDL) for the obstruction of the workers' right to establish and join trade unions. It further notes the Government's indication that a working group, constituted of representatives of the Ministry of Economy and Trade, the National Confederation of Trade Unions and the Ministry of Justice, examined the possibility of setting administrative sanctions against acts of interference in trade union activities, which is currently not provided for in section 61. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any new developments in this respect and to ensure that these sanctions are applied through effective and expeditious procedures. The Committee further requests the Government to provide a copy of the relevant provisions of the Code on Contraventions.

Article 4. Compulsory arbitration. The Committee recalls that it had requested the Government to amend section 360(1) of the Labour Code according to which, if the parties to the collective labour dispute have not reached an agreement or disagree with the decision of the reconciliation commission, either party has the right to submit an application to settle the conflict in the judicial tribunals. The Committee notes the Government's indication that section 360(1) is not applicable at the stage of elaboration of the initial draft collective agreement, in which case, section 32 applies. According to the latter, if within three months from the beginning of negotiations, consent has not been achieved on some of the agreement's provisions, the parties are obliged to sign a collective agreement containing the clauses on which agreement has been reached. The disagreements that have not been settled are subject to further collective negotiations or are resolved according to the provisions of the Labour Code. As to the referral of the dispute to the judiciary, the Government indicates that this occurs when a party to the conflict feels that its rights have been violated. The Government also indicates that arbitration is a good solution for the collective conflicts which arise from the arbitrary interests under negotiation. While noting this information, the Committee refers to the clear wording of section 360(1) and once again recalls that arbitration imposed by the authorities at the request of one party is generally contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements established in the Convention and thus the autonomy of the bargaining partners. Recourse to compulsory arbitration in cases where the parties do not reach an agreement through collective bargaining should be permissible only in the context of essential services in the strict sense of the term (i.e. services, the interruption of which would endanger the life, safety or health of the whole or part of the population) or for public servants engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation so as to ensure that referral of the dispute to the judicial tribunals is possible only upon request by both parties to the dispute, or for essential services in the strict sense of the term or for public servants engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the progress made in this respect.

Mozambique

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee notes from the Government's report that a new Labour Act (Act No. 23/2007) has been adopted.

The Committee observes that some provisions of the Labour Act are not consistent with the Convention:

- section 149, which allows the central body of the labour administration 45 days within which to register an employers' or workers' organization. In the Committee's view, a protracted registration procedure is a serious obstacle to the establishment of an organization and amounts to a denial of the right of workers and employers to set up organizations of their own choosing. The Committee suggests reducing the time limit to 30 days, for example;
- section 189, which provides for compulsory arbitration for the essential services listed in section 205 which include the postal service, the loading and unloading of animals and perishable foodstuffs, weather monitoring and fuel supply, and also for export processing zones (section 206 and Decree No. 75/99). The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration to end collective labour disputes or strikes is acceptable only when requested by both parties to the dispute or in cases where the strike may be restricted or prohibited, namely in the case of a dispute in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, that is, services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. In these circumstances, the Committee takes the view that any disputes that arise in the abovementioned services should not be subject to compulsory arbitration and that they could be dealt with under the mediation and conciliation procedures provided for by law;
- section 207, which provides that the notice of strike must state the duration of the strike. In the Committee's view, workers and their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to call an indefinite strike;
- section 212, which allows a strike to be ended by a decision of the mediation and arbitration body. The Committee considers that this is a decision for the workers and the organizations that called the strike;

- section 268(3), which provides that any breach of sections 199 (freedom to work of non-strikers), section 202(1) and section 209(1) (on minimum services) constitutes a breach of discipline for which the workers on strike are civilly and penally liable. The Committee reminds the Government that strikes should not be subject to penal sanctions except in the event of non-compliance with prohibitions on strikes that are consistent with the principles of freedom of association, and that any penalty imposed for unlawful activities relating to strikes should be proportionate to the offence or misconduct, and that imprisonment for those organizing or participating in a peaceful strike should be excluded by the authorities.

While noting the Government's information that the Labour Act was adopted by consensus, that the legislation is undergoing revision and a legal reform technical unit has been set up for the purpose, and that some provisions of the Labour Code that are not consistent with the Convention will be amended in due course with assistance from the ILO, the Committee expresses the hope that these amendments will be made in the near future and will cover all the points it has raised. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any measures taken in this regard.

Public servants. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that public servants do not have the right to organize. It noted that according to the Government, the Labour Code does not cover this matter and that through the Ministry of the Public Service a preliminary draft of a general law on public servants has been submitted to Parliament and is to regulate exercise of the right of association by this category of workers. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it took note of a preliminary draft of a law on the exercise of trade union activities in the public administration and pointed out that the following provisions raised problems of conformity with the Convention:

- section 2(2), which excludes firefighters, members of the judiciary and prison guards from the scope of the future Act. The Committee recalls that Article 2 of the Convention provides that all workers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing and that, in accordance with Article 9 of the Convention, only the armed forces and the police may be excluded from the right to organize;
- section 42(2), which provides that public officials have the right to strike once conciliation, mediation and arbitration procedures have been exhausted. The Committee points out in this connection that compulsory arbitration upon application by only one of the parties in the public administration may be imposed only in the case of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State;
- section 43, which allows disciplinary, civil and penal sanctions to be imposed when a strike affects the rights and interests of third parties, when it impedes or disrupts exercise of the right to work by officials or employees who are not on strike and when it disrupts the operation of services which are not on strike. The Committee recalls in this connection that sanctions for strike action should be possible only where the prohibitions are consistent with the principles of freedom of association; that applying disproportionate penal sanctions is not conducive to the development of harmonious and stable industrial relations; and that if penalties of imprisonment are to be imposed at all, they should be justified by the seriousness of the offences committed and should be subject to regular judicial review. In any event, a right of appeal should exist in this respect (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 177);
- section 46(2), which establishes sentences of imprisonment and fines in instances where a strike picket obstructs the freedom of services to operate normally. The Committee refers the Government in this connection to the principle set forth in the previous paragraph.

In these circumstances, the Committee expresses the hope that the preliminary draft of the general law on public servants which will regulate the right of association and which is before Parliament, will be in full conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress of this draft legislation.

Comments by workers' organizations. In its previous observation, the Committee noted comments by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) referring to large-scale dismissals of workers in export processing zones as a reprisal for exercising the right to strike, and asked the Government to send detailed information on the circumstances in which the strike took place, the authority that declared the strike to be unlawful and the authority that allowed the dismissals. The Committee notes the Government's response that in the case of the two strikes referred to by the ICFTU: (1) there was breach of the requirements, set in section 9 of Decree No. 75/99 of 12 October regulating working conditions in industrial export processing zones, concerning compulsory arbitration, which may be imposed ex officio by the labour administration body and prior notification of strikes, and the stipulation that strikes may be called only by the provincial or national union after confirmation from the Industrial Export-Processing Zone Council that minimum services are guaranteed; and (2) the workers dismissed filed a complaint with the Labour Court. The Committee reminds the Government that enterprise unions should likewise be able to exercise the right to strike, and refers the Government to its comments on compulsory arbitration. It recalls that dismissals of strikers on a large-scale involve a serious risk of abuse and place freedom of association in grave jeopardy. It hopes that in reviewing the dismissals in question, the judicial authorities will take into consideration the comments on the legislation.

Lastly, the Committee notes the comments of 29 August 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention, and serious acts of violence against workers on strike in the sugar cane plantation sector. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments thereon.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1955)

The Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2268 and 2591 (351st Report, approved by the Governing Body at its 303rd Session, November 2008 paragraphs 1016–1050; 349th Report approved by the Governing Body at its 301st Session, paragraphs 1062–1093). It also notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008 on grave matters which arose in the course of 2007 as well as its previous comments on very serious issues which arose in 2005–06 and the Government's response to some of these issues:

1. In reply to the ITUC comments relating to severe repression by the Government of the September 2007 uprising against the military Government of the State Peace and Development Council (SPDC) which had been led by Buddhist monks, and supported by workers, students, and citizen activists, the Committee notes the Government's indication that ten persons died and 14 were injured; in total, 2,284 persons were found to have been involved in the unrest in Yangon and 643 persons outside Yangon; among them a total of 2,836 persons (2,235 from Yangon and 601 out of Yangon) were released; 91 remained under arrest (49 from Yangon and 42 from outside Yangon); these were involved in violence and terrorist acts and necessary measures were being taken against them in accordance with the laws. The Government adds that the SPDC is making efforts for the emergence of a peaceful, modern, disciplined, flourishing, democratic nation upholding the three main National Causes; the vast majority of the people have already adopted the Constitution, the fourth step of the seven-step road map, to shape the future State; on 23 September 2008 the Government released from prison 9,002 prisoners with good conduct and discipline, for social and family reasons.

2. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to the arrest, heavy-handed interrogation and long prison sentences imposed on six workers (Thurein Aung, Wai Lin, Nyi Nyi Zaw, Kyaw Kyaw, Kyaw Win and Myo Min) who participated in a 2007 May Day event at the "American center" in Yangon and tried to relay news to the outside world through the Burma-Thai border; significant harassment of their lawyers by the authorities which prompted them to withdraw from the case on 4 August; the conviction of the six workers on 7 September to 20 years imprisonment for sedition and additional convictions of Thurein Aung, Wai Lin, Kyaw Win, and Myo Min to another five years in prison for association with the Federation of Trade Unions of Burma (FTUB) under section 17(1) of the Unlawful Associations Act and to three years for illegally crossing a border, as a result of which their jail time amounted to 28 years in total. The six activists filed appeals which were dismissed, prompting them to file their appeals to the Supreme Court, where they were pending at year's end.

The Committee notes that according to the Government, the Supreme Court has held hearings on this case which is pending before it. The Government regrets the request made by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2591 (see below) for the release of the six activists which, according to the Government, constitutes interference with the internal affairs of the country. The Government adds that: (i) Article 8 of the Convention requires workers and their organizations to respect the law of the land; (ii) the six persons were not workers at a factory or workplace; (iii) they were arrested not for holding a May Day event but for inciting hatred or contempt for the Government (section 124(A) of the Penal Code), for being a member of or contacting an unlawful association (section 17(1) of the Unlawful Association Act, 1908) and for illegally leaving and re-entering the country (section 13(1) of the Immigration (Emergency) Provisions Act, 1947); (iv) the FTUB does not represent any workforce in Myanmar; it is a terrorist group in the guise of a workers' organization; (v) the authorities allow the detainees to meet with guests and relatives; they also allowed Mr Thomás Ojea Quintana, Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Myanmar, to meet with Thurein Aung, Kyaw Kyaw and Su Su Ngwe on 5 August 2008; upon request for medical (dental) treatment of Thurein Aung, the Government arranged for a dentist to cure him; (vi) the Special Rapporteur also met with the Minister of Labour and the Human Rights Committee. As for the FTUB, in particular, the Government adds that: (i) after the adoption of the Constitution, the organizations and associations in Myanmar will need to be established under the existing laws of the country and should have locus standi; (ii) the FTUB is not represented anywhere in the workforce of the country; it is illegally established outside the country by persons who absconded and are fugitives from justice; (iii) there is strong and firm evidence that the FTUB has committed terrorist acts uncovered in June 2004; by virtue of the International Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism and the International Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism the Government issued Declaration No. 172006 on 12 April 2007 announcing that the FTUB was a terrorist group.

In this regard, the Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2591 (349th Report, paragraphs 1062–1093 and 351st Report, paragraphs 144–150), according to which "it is undeniable that the six persons were punished for exercising their fundamental right to freedom of association and the freedom of expression". It observes that their convictions were based on such acts like, for example, holding a public lecture to discuss "problems encountered by workers at their respective workplaces, which had an effect of agitating them" or preparing a speech on "salaries, disproportionate prices for goods, right to take leaves, pension and the failure of the Government to address these issues", which were considered by the Government and the courts as "defam[ing] the Government". The Committee also notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association called on the Government to recognize the FTUB as a legitimate trade union organization and to allow for the free operation of any form of organization of collective representation of workers including the legalization of the FTUB (349th Report, paragraphs 1083, 1089, 1092; 351st Report, paragraph 1038). With regard to the appeal filed by the workers to the Supreme Court, the Committee on Freedom of Association indicated its deep concern at “the indication in the [first instance] judgement that the court explicitly ordered the destruction of all but some evidence presented to it (Case No. 82), thus rendering any review by a higher tribunal virtually impossible” (349th Report, paragraph 1088). As a result, the Committee on Freedom of Association called for the immediate release of the six activists, Thurein Aung, Wai Lin, Nyi Nyi Zaw, Kyaw Kyaw, Kyaw Win and Myo Min.

3. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to the imprisonment of Myo Aung Thant, member of the All Burma Petro-Chemical Corporation Union, who has now been in jail for over 11 years after having been convicted for high treason for maintaining contacts with the FTUB (under section 122(1) of the Penal Code). The Committee notes that according to the Government, Myo Aung Thant is still in prison for breaking the laws of the country and it is impossible to release him, and ITUC should not interfere in the internal judicial affairs of an ILO member State. The Committee notes in this regard the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in its interim report concerning Case No. 2268 (351st Report, paragraphs 1016–1050) in which the Committee on Freedom of Association deplored the Government’s refusal to consider the release of Myo Aung Thant and strongly urged the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure his immediate release from prison.

4. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to the killing of Saw Mya Than – FTUB member and official of the Kawthoolei Education Workers’ Union (KEWU), allegedly murdered by the army in retaliation for a rebel attack. The Committee notes that according to the Government, Saw Mya Than’s death was an accident caused by the KNU, an insurgent organization. The Committee notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association requested the Government in the framework of Case No. 2268 to institute an independent inquiry into the alleged murder of Saw Mya Than – to be carried out by a panel of experts considered impartial by all the parties concerned.

5. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to the detention and sentencing of Burma Railway Union leader U Tin Hla, a long-serving electrician with the Myanmar Railway Corporation. He was arrested along with his entire family on 20 November 2007; while his family was later released, he was charged under section 19(a) of the Penal Code for possession of explosives which were, in fact, electric wires and tools in his toolbox; after a brief trial, he was sentenced to seven years in prison; in reality, his crime was apparently his very active efforts to organize workers from the railways and other sectors to support the popular uprising of the Buddhist monks and people in late September 2007. He was 60 years old when arrested and there are significant concerns for his health in prison. His requests to see a doctor have been denied.

The Committee notes that according to the Government, the ITUC always refers to an imaginary union when making allegations on persons; U Tin Hla was not a member of a union, but rather a supervisor working in Myanmar Railways and there is no union under the Myanmar Railways. On 14 November 2007 at about 9.30 pm the Police Force of Yangon Division made a surprise check at his house and found him with 337 point 30 carbine bullets and 13 9mm bullets. The Township Court convicted him to seven years’ imprisonment.

6. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to the arrest on 13 November in Yangon of Su Su Nway, the activist who brought a forced labour complaint to the ILO which subsequently resulted in the first successful conviction of four local officials for procuring forced labour; she was arrested for her actions in supporting workers’ participation in the September uprising; at the end of the year, she was being held in Insein prison, awaiting trial on charges of sedition. The Committee notes that according to the Government, this case does not relate to workers’ rights; following complaint No. 2469/07, Su Su Nway was charged under sections 143 and 147 of the Penal Code and the case is before a special court in Insein Prison (Criminal Regular Trial No. 10/2008).

7. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to:

- the disappearance on 22 September 2007 of Lay Lay Mon, a female labour activist who is a former political prisoner, after helping organize workers to support protesting monks and citizens in the uprising in Yangon; she is believed to be incarcerated in Insein prison but at year end there was no news of if, or when, she would be brought to trial;
- the disappearance of labour activist Myint Soe during the last week of September 2007 after being active in engaging with workers to increase their involvement in the September uprising.

8. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to the arrest by the military authorities on 8 and 9 August 2006 of seven members of the family of the FTUB member and activist Thein Win at their house in the Kyun Tharyar section of Pegu city. While in detention, several male members of the family were tortured while being interrogated. On 3 and 4 September 2006, the authorities released four of the family members. According to the latest communication by the ITUC, three of Thein Win’s siblings (Tin Oo, Kyi Thein and Chaw Su Hlaing) were sentenced to 18 years in jail under section 17(1) and (2) of the Unlawful Associations Act. Tin Oo suffered such intensive torture during detention that he has now become mentally unstable and there are fears for his health.

The Committee notes that according to the Government, Thein Win and six other persons were prosecuted under Criminal Procedure No. 1475/06 at the Township Court of Justice of Toungoo in Pegu Division on 20 September 2008. They were connected to a bomb blast in Paenwegone and the insurgency as well as to participation in terrorist activities. The Southern Military Command made the necessary investigation and the father, mother, brother, sister and sister-in-law were released in September 2006. They went back to their residence and on 2 October 2006 they ran away from Myanmar to Maesauk, Thailand.

9. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to the arrest in March 2006 of five underground democracy and labour activists for a variety of offences connected to efforts to provide information to the FTUB and other organizations considered as illegal by the regime, and to organize peaceful anti-SPDC demonstrations. All five were sentenced to long prison terms and four were serving those terms in Insein prison (U Aung Thein, 76 years old, sentenced to 20 years; Khin Maung Win, sentenced to 17 years; Ma Khin Mar Soe, 17 years; Ma Thein Thein Aye, 11 years; and U Aung Moe, 78 years old, sentenced to 20 years); according to the latest communication by ITUC, they are still serving their sentence.

10. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to intimidation by the army of the 934 workers at Hae Wae Garment, located in South Okkapala Township in Yangon, who went on strike on 2 May 2006 to demand better terms and conditions of work. The 48 workers allowed to meet with the authorities were forced to sign a written statement that indicated that there were no problems at the factory. A detachment of 12–20 police officers were regularly present in the factory after workers returned to work.

11. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to the:

- arrest and sentencing to a four-year prison term with hard labour of Naw Bey Bey, an activist member of the Karen Health Workers' Union (KHWU); she was supposedly held in Toungoo;
- arrest, torture and killing of Saw Thoo Di, a.k.a. Saw Ther Paw, a Karen Agricultural Workers' Union (KAWU) committee member from Kya-Inn township, Karen State, by an armed column of Infantry Battalion 83 outside his village on 28 April 2006.

12. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to the shelling of the Pha village with mortars and rocket propelled grenades by Light Infantry Battalion 308 which had been sent by the SPDC military upon learning that, on 30 April 2006, the FTUB and Federation of Trade Unions–Kawthoolei (FTUK) were preparing a May Day workers' rights commemoration.

13. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to the discovery in early June 2005 by the SPDC of an underground network of ten FTUB organizers in the Pegu area who were providing support and education to workers and serving as a networking and information link to FTUB structures abroad. Seven men and three women were arrested. In a press conference held on 28 August 2005, the SPDC leaders accused the organizers of having used satellite phones to convey information from inside Burma to the FTUB, which then provided information to the ILO and the international trade union movement. The arrested FTUB members were taken to the infamous Aug Tha Pay interrogation centre in Mayangone district of Yangon where they were investigated and tortured by special branch police and the Bureau of Special Operations (military intelligence) personnel during the months of June and July. On 29 July 2005, they were transferred to Insein prison, and their case sent to a special court that conducts its hearings inside the prison. During the secret trial, they were denied access to outside council or witnesses, and the proceedings clearly did not meet international judicial standards. They were all found guilty and were sentenced on 10 October 2005. Wai Lin and Win Myint, as key leaders of the network, respectively received sentences of 25 years and 18 years; the other five men and two of the women (Hla Myint Than, Major Win Myint, Ye Myint, Thein Lwin Oo, Aung Myint Thein, Aye Chan, Kin Kyi), each received seven-year jail terms, and bank clerk Ma Aye Thin Khine was sentenced to three years of imprisonment. In its latest communication, the ITUC adds that, at the end of 2007, all these FTUB members were still being detained in Insein prison.

The Committee deeply regrets that the Government's response fails to acknowledge any of the fundamental rights and basic civil liberties of workers contained in the Convention. The Committee regrets the dismissive tone of the Government's reply to the comments by ITUC as well as the paucity of the information provided which is in stark contrast to the extreme gravity of the issues raised by ITUC. It strongly condemns the Government's view that comments made by workers' organizations under article 23 of the ILO Constitution and recommendations made by the ILO supervisory bodies to remedy violations of the fundamental rights of workers constitute interference in internal affairs. It emphasizes in this regard that the membership of a State in the International Labour Organization carries with it the obligation to respect in national legislation freedom of association principles and the Conventions which the State has freely ratified including Convention No. 87. The Committee stresses that respect for the right to life and other civil liberties is a fundamental prerequisite for the exercise of the rights contained in the Convention and workers and employers should be able to exercise their freedom of association rights in a climate of complete freedom and security, free from violence and threats. Furthermore, as regards the reported torture, cruelty and ill-treatment, the Committee points out that trade unionists, like all other individuals, should enjoy the safeguards provided by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and governments should give the necessary instructions to ensure that no detainee suffers such treatment (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 29–30). In addition, noting that several trade unionists have been tried by special courts inside prisons and taking note of court orders to destroy evidence thus rendering any appeal virtually impossible, the Committee emphasizes that it should be the policy of every government to ensure observance of human rights and especially of the right of all detained or accused persons to receive a fair trial with all guarantees of due process.

The Committee, noting that there is currently no legal basis to the respect for, and realization of, freedom of association in Myanmar, recalls once again that while trade unions are expected under Article 8 of the Convention to respect the law of the land, “[t]he law of the land shall not be such as to impair, nor shall it be so applied as to impair, the guarantees provided for in this Convention”. The authorities should not seize on legitimate trade union activities as a pretext for arbitrary arrest or detention and allegations of criminal conduct should not be used to harass trade unionists by reason of their union membership or activities. In this regard, the Committee deeply regrets that ordinary trade union activities like speeches on socio-economic issues of direct interest to the workers, participation in May Day events and the mere communication of information to the FTUB are considered by the Government as criminal activity and punished with severe prison sentences. The Committee emphasizes that the holding of public meetings and the voicing of demands of a social and economic nature on the occasion of May Day are traditional forms of trade union action and trade unions should have the right to organize freely whatever meetings they wish to celebrate on May Day; freedom of expression which should be enjoyed by trade unionists should also be guaranteed when they wish to criticize the Government’s economic and social policy. With regard to the conviction of trade unionists for passing a border and the Government’s comments on the FTUB being an “alien” organization, the Committee emphasizes that in accordance with the principle enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country and that forced exile of trade union leaders and unionists constitutes a serious infringement of human rights and trade union rights, since it weakens the trade union movement as a whole when it is deprived of its leaders. With regard to the Government’s reference to other Conventions, in order to justify violations of this fundamental Convention, the Committee emphasizes that a state cannot use the argument that other commitments or agreements justify the non-application of ratified ILO Conventions.

The Committee therefore once again most strongly deplores the serious alleged acts of murder, arrest, detention, torture and sentencing to many years of imprisonment of trade unionists for the exercise of ordinary trade union activities, including the mere sending of information to the FTUB and participation in May Day activities. The Committee urges, once again, the Government to provide information on measures adopted and instructions issued without delay so as to ensure respect for the fundamental civil liberties of trade union members and officers and to take all necessary measures to release all those who have been imprisoned for the exercise of trade union activities immediately and to ensure that no worker is sanctioned for the exercise of such activities, in particular for having contacts with workers’ organizations of their own choosing. Furthermore, recalling that the right of workers and employers to freely establish and join organizations of their own choosing cannot exist unless such freedom is established and recognized both in law and in practice, the Committee urges the Government to indicate all measures taken, including instructions issued, to ensure the free operation of any form of organization of collective representation of workers, freely chosen by them to defend and promote their economic and social interests, including organizations which operate in exile.

Concerning the legislative framework (Articles 2, 3, 5 and 6 of the Convention), the Committee notes the comments made by ITUC on issues that have already been raised by the Committee over the years, including the prohibition of trade unions and the absence of any legal basis for freedom of association in Myanmar (repressive anti-union legislation, obscure legislative framework, military orders and decrees further limiting freedom of association, a single trade union system established in the 1964 Law and an unclear constitutional framework); the Federation of Trade Unions of Burma (FTUB) forced to work underground and accused of terrorism; “workers’ committees” organized by the authorities; and the repression of seafarers even overseas and the denial of their right to be represented by the Seafarers’ Union of Burma (SUB) which is affiliated to the FTUB and the International Transport Workers’ Federation (ITF).

The Committee notes that according to the Government:

- the Referendum for the adoption of the Constitution was successfully held and the “yes” vote amounted to 92.4 per cent according to Announcement No. 10/2008 of 15 May 2008 by the Commission for Holding the Referendum of the Government of the Union of Myanmar. Chapter VIII on Citizenship, Fundamental Rights and Duties of Citizens provides in paragraph 354 that: “There shall be liberty in the exercise of the following rights subject to the laws enacted for State security, prevalence of law and order, community peace and tranquillity or public order and morality: (a) the right of the citizens to express freely their convictions and opinions; (b) the right of the citizens to assemble peacefully without arms; (c) the right of the citizens to form associations and unions.”;
- as a consequence of these provisions, a legislative framework has been established and the initial steps are being taken for the establishment of trade unions at the basic level, aimed at free and independent workers’ organizations. Basic workers’ organizations have already been formed in 11 industrial zones;
- furthermore, work is now beginning at the respective Committees on amending, reviewing and revising the provisions of the various labour laws adopted on the basis of the 1964 Law Defining the Fundamental Rights and Responsibilities of the People’s Workers. Moreover, the issues raised by the Committee on the Trade Disputes Act 1929 and Trade Union Act 1926 are addressed in the New State Constitution through Chapter IV on Legislation, Chapter VIII on Citizenship, Fundamental Rights and Duties of Citizens and Chapter XV on General Provisions. As for Orders Nos 2/88 and 6/88, the Government indicates that during this transitional period, it will need to draw up measures of protection against persons who will attempt to generate hatred or contempt or excite or provoke disaffection towards the Government established by law in the Union of Myanmar or for the constituent units thereof. But, as a result of the New State Constitution, in future, Order 6/88 will be addressed through the drafting of the new Trade Union Law, and the procedures of the registration of the workers' organizations will be included in this new law;

- finally, concerning seafarers, the Government indicates that the Department of Marine Administration under the Ministry of Transport has allowed those Myanmar seafarers who are working on board ships to inform and complain to the Seamen Employment Control Division (SECD) and also inform and complain to the ITF or any other valid association for the prejudice suffered to their interests and their rights.

The Committee recalls that, for several years, it has indicated that there exist some pieces of legislation containing important restrictions to freedom of association or provisions which, although not directly aimed at freedom of association, can be applied in a manner that seriously impairs the exercise of the right to organize. More specifically: (1) Order No. 6/88 of 30 September 1988 provides that the "organizations shall apply for permission to form to the Ministry of Home and Religious Affairs" (section 3(a)), and states that any person found guilty of being a member of, or aiding and abetting, or using the paraphernalia of, organizations that are not permitted shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years (section 7); (2) Order No. 2/88 prohibits the gathering, walking or marching in procession by a group of five or more people regardless of whether the act is with the intention of creating a disturbance or of committing a crime; (3) the Unlawful Association Act of 1908 provides that whoever is a member of an unlawful association, or takes part in meetings of any such association, or contributes or receives or solicits any contribution for the purpose of any such association, or in any way assists the operations of any such association, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which shall not be less than two years and more than three years and shall also be liable to a fine (section 17.1); (4) the 1926 Trade Union Act requires that 50 per cent of workers must belong to a trade union for it to be legally recognized; (5) the 1964 Law Defining the Fundamental Rights and Responsibilities of the People's Workers establishes a compulsory system for the organization and representation of workers and imposes a single trade union; (6) the 1929 Trade Disputes Act contains numerous prohibitions of the right to strike and empowers the President to refer trade disputes to Courts of Inquiry or to Industrial Courts.

While noting the Government's indications on the adoption of the Constitution and upcoming legislative reforms, the Committee must, however, observe that there is currently no legal basis to the respect for, and realization of, freedom of association in Myanmar and that the broad exclusionary clause of section 354 of the Constitution subjects the exercise of this right "to the laws enacted for State security, prevalence of law and order, community peace and tranquillity or public order and morality". The Committee notes with deep regret that the drafting of section 354 of the Constitution may continue to give rise to continued violations of freedom of association in law and practice. Recalling the particularly serious and urgent issues that this Committee has been raising for nearly 20 years now, the Committee deplores this persistent failure to take any measures to remedy the legislative situation which constitutes a serious and ongoing breach by the Government of its obligations flowing from its voluntary ratification of the Convention. Furthermore, the Committee deeply regrets the exclusion from any meaningful consultation of the social partners and civil society as a whole, which would be a necessary foundation for the establishment of a legislative framework on the particularly serious and urgent issues raised in relation to the application of the Convention. It must also express serious doubts as to whether the "trade unions" referred to by the Government actually reflect the free choice and interests of workers within the current framework of a total absence of an enabling legislative framework and recurrent violations of freedom of association in practice.

The Committee once again urges the Government to furnish without delay a detailed report on the concrete measures taken to enact legislation guaranteeing to all workers and employers the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, as well as the rights of these organizations to exercise their activities and formulate their programmes and to affiliate with federations, confederations and international organizations of their own choosing without interference from the public authorities. It further urges the Government in the strongest terms to immediately repeal Orders Nos 2/88 and 6/88, as well as the Unlawful Association Act, so that they cannot be applied in a manner that would infringe upon the rights of workers' and employers' organizations. It requests the Government to communicate any steps taken towards the adoption of draft laws, orders or instructions to guarantee freedom of association so that it may examine their conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 98th Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2009.]

Namibia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the Public Service Union of Namibia (PSUN) dated 26 October 2007, and by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008, concerning the application of the Convention and, in particular, the exclusion of prison service staff from the provisions of the new Labour Act of 2007, and hence from the guarantees afforded by the Convention.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to organize of prison staff. The Committee notes the adoption of the new Labour Act of 2007, which is not yet in force. The Committee notes that section 2(2)(d) of the Labour Act excludes members of the Namibian Prison Service from the Labour Act's provisions, unless the Prisons Service Act, 1998 (Act No. 17 of 1998) provides otherwise. The Committee further notes, in this regard, that the Prisons Service Act does not provide for the extension of the new Labour Act's guarantees to the Namibian Prison Service; nor does it contain any provisions establishing freedom of association rights for the latter.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it is willing to consider the issue, and that it is therefore thought appropriate to first consult widely with all the relevant parties before a decision is taken on whether to amend the Labour Act or the Prisons Service Act in order to give effect to the principles of freedom of association and the right to organize, as well as to provide for effective mechanisms to deal with and resolve labour disputes. The Committee further notes that, according to the Government, the consultation process – which would include the ILO – will take considerable time before any tangible decision to change the legislation can be taken. In these circumstances, the Committee expresses the hope that the necessary legislative amendments to guarantee to the prisons service the rights provided under the Convention will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, any developments in this regard.

A request concerning other points is being addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It further notes the comments submitted by the Public Service Union of Namibia (PSUN) in a communication of 26 October 2007, and by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication of 29 August 2008, concerning the application of the Convention and, in particular, the exclusion of prison service staff from the provisions of the new Labour Act of 2007, and hence from the guarantees afforded by the Convention.

Article 6 of the Convention. Rights of prison staff. The Committee notes the adoption of the new Labour Act of 2007 which has not yet entered into force. The Committee notes that section 2(2)(d) of the Labour Act excludes members of the Namibian prison service from the Labour Act's provisions, unless the Prisons Service Act provides otherwise. The Committee further notes, in this regard, that the Prisons Service Act does not provide for the extension of the new Labour Act's guarantees to the Namibian prison service; nor does it contain any provisions establishing freedom of association rights for the latter.

In these circumstances, the Committee recalls that all public service workers, with the sole possible exception of the armed forces, the police, and public servants directly engaged in the administration of the State, should enjoy the rights enshrined in the Convention, including the right to collective bargaining. The Committee expresses the hope that the necessary legislative amendments to guarantee, to the prisons service, the rights provided under the Convention will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, any developments in this regard.

A request concerning other points is being addressed directly to the Government.

Nepal

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee notes with interest from the Government's report and the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008, that the Interim Constitution which entered into force in 2007 guarantees in Articles 12 and 30 the right to organize and engage in collective bargaining. Moreover, the Civil Service Ordinance Act which previously revoked the right of public servants to form and belong to trade unions, has been amended by the Civil Service Act thus restoring the right of public employees (up to Gazetted Third Class) to organize and bargain collectively. The Committee requests the Government to specify the categories of public employees included in the gazetted and non-gazetted classes and which ones are covered by the legislative recognition of the right to organize and engage in collective bargaining.

The Committee also takes note of the National Directive Act, 1962 and the Civil Service Act communicated by the Government. The Committee will comment on them once a translation is available. Finally, the Committee takes note of the draft National Labour Commission Act drafted by a national tripartite task force on the basis of widespread consultations, in order to address shortcomings in the system of grievance and dispute resolution. The Committee raises certain issues in relation to this draft Act below.

Article 1 of the Convention. Anti-union discrimination. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need for provisions providing explicit protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, accompanied by effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. The Committee notes from the Government's report that based on the constitutional provision concerning discrimination and section 23(a) of the Trade Union Act, 1992, which explicitly discourages anti-union discrimination in respect of employment, there have hardly been any acts of anti-union discrimination brought to the notice of the authorities. However, maximum protection will be explicitly ensured through the upcoming labour market reform and the revision of the related laws by the tripartite task force. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated in order to introduce in legislation: (i) an explicit prohibition of all prejudicial acts committed against workers by reason of their trade union membership or participation in trade union activities at the time of recruitment, during employment or at the time of dismissal (e.g. transfers, demotions, refusal of training, dismissals, etc.); and (ii) effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions in cases of violation of this prohibition.

Article 2. Acts of interference. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to ensure the enactment of a provision providing protection to workers' and employers' organizations against acts of interference by one another, and including effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions guaranteeing adequate protection to trade unions against acts of interference in their establishment, functioning or administration and, in particular, against acts which are designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers' organizations, or to support workers' organizations by financial or other means, with the objective of placing such organizations under the control of employers or employers' organizations. The Committee notes from the Government's report that interference is hardly practised in Nepal although there is no explicit provision against such activities in the legislation. The issue shall be addressed in the course of the labour market reform. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated in order to introduce in the legislation a prohibition of acts of interference as well as rapid appeal procedures and dissuasive sanctions against such acts.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. 1. Compulsory arbitration. The Committee notes that according to section 9(4) of the draft National Labour Commission Act, this National Labour Commission will have the power, in applying the Essential Services Act, 1957 and section 30 of the Trade Union Act, to arbitrate interests disputes in the hotel and transportation sectors as well as in cases where the authorities consider that the economic development of the country so requires. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration imposed either at the request of one party to a dispute or by the authorities at their own initiative, raises problems with regard to the application of Article 4 of the Convention (General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 256–258). The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken to address the set of provisions noted above in the context of labour market reform so as to ensure that compulsory arbitration is not imposed at the initiative of one party to an interests dispute in the hotel and transportation sectors or at the initiative of the authorities where they consider that the country's economic development so requires; compulsory arbitration would only be acceptable in essential services in the strict sense of the term and for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State.

2. Composition of arbitration bodies. The Committee notes that section 6 of the draft National Labour Commission Act provides that the Appointment Committee responsible for determining the composition of the National Labour Commission shall consist, inter alia, of two persons duly nominated by the Federation of Nepal Chamber of Commerce and Industry. The Committee considers that any decisions concerning the participation of workers' and employers' organizations in a tripartite body – especially one entrusted with mediation, conciliation and arbitration proceedings – should be taken in full consultation with all the organizations whose representativity has been objectively proved. The Committee considers, thus, that the members of the Appointment Committee should not be determined by reference to a specific organization by name, but rather to the “most representative” organization. The Committee therefore requests the Government to avoid any reference to the Federation of Nepal Chamber of Commerce and Industry or any other organization in the draft National Labour Commission Act, and to refer rather to the “most representative” employers' organization.

3. Measures to promote collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that according to the ITUC, although the Labour Act provides for collective bargaining, the necessary structure for the implementation of the provisions is not in place. The Committee notes that in its latest comments of August 2008, the ITUC indicates that owing to a combination of worker inexperience and employer reluctance, there is, in fact, little collective bargaining and the related agreements only cover around 10 per cent of workers in the formal economy. The Committee notes from the Government's report that strategy No. 3.2.6 of the Labour and Employment Policy 2062 states that collective bargaining (which now includes 155 collective agreements at the level of plants and eight at national level) will be encouraged through legal and institutional provisions and by building an environment conducive to the organization of workers and employers in the informal economy. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the impact of these measures as well as any further measures taken to promote collective bargaining and to provide statistical data on the scope of the collective agreements which have already been concluded.

Netherlands

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1993)

Protection against acts of interference. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to introduce safeguards in the process of extension of sectoral collective agreements to ensure trade union independence and avoid the weakening of sectoral collective agreements. In this regard, the Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2628 (351st Report approved by the Governing Body at its 303rd Session (November 2008)). The Committee notes with satisfaction from the Government's report that: (i) the previous policy was one in which the Minister of Social Affairs and Employment had authority to declare a collective agreement universally binding in a certain branch of industry and to grant dispensation (exemption) more or less automatically when so requested by parties which had previously concluded collective agreements at a lower level; (ii) this policy had to be abandoned following a decision of the Council of State which decided on 27 October 2004 that such a dispensation decision is open to objection and appeal and that there must be a clearer set of procedural rules; in response, the Government changed the regulations from 1 January 2007 after prior consultations with the Labour Foundation and the other relevant parties not represented in the Labour Foundation; and (iii) as a result, the Minister can grant upon request an exemption from an order declaring a collective agreement universally binding for a branch of the industry, if due to compelling arguments, the application of the provisions of the collective agreement in question cannot reasonably be required of certain businesses or subsectors; compelling arguments exist in particular if the specific characteristics of the business or subsector differ on essential points from those to which the universally binding agreement is to apply; it is also required that the parties applying for an exemption have themselves concluded a legally binding collective agreement, and that they are independent with respect to each other. The Committee further notes that according to the Government, if the collective agreement whose provisions are declared universally binding contains minimum provisions, the provisions of the other collective agreement will continue to be effective in so far as they are more favourable. If, however, the collective agreement whose provisions are declared universally binding contains more favourable conditions than the other collective agreement, the order declaring universally binding status will result in these more favourable conditions applying across the board for all employers and employees in the branch of the industry.

Protection against anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments the Committee had invited the Government to initiate discussions with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations with a view to identifying appropriate means for addressing the issue of the protection against acts of anti-union discrimination other than dismissal (for instance, transfer, relocation, demotion and deprivation or restriction of remuneration, social benefits or vocational training) to trade union members who are not trade union representatives. The Committee notes that the Government considers that there is no serious imminent reason to initiate the discussions and will therefore send a request to the most representative organizations of employers and workers represented in the Labour Foundation to assess the need for such discussions amongst the social partners. The Committee recalls that Article 1 of the Convention requires protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination for all "workers" with the only possible exceptions contained in Article 6 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated in the framework that it intends to create, with a view to ensuring comprehensive protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, other than dismissal, to trade union members.

Comments of the FNV. The Committee takes note of the comments made by the Netherlands Trade Union Confederation (FNV) in a communication dated 29 August 2008 concerning the impact which an opinion published by the Netherlands Competition Authority (NMA) has had in practice, by discouraging negotiations with employers at the sectoral level, on the terms and conditions of contract labour (performed by individuals who do not necessarily work under the strict authority of the employer and who may have more than one workplace). The Committee observes that the FNV refers to serious matters and recalls that Article 4 of the Convention establishes the principle of free and voluntary collective bargaining and the autonomy of the bargaining parties. It requests the Government to provide detailed comments in this regard.

Aruba

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had asked the Government to amend or repeal section 374(a) to (c) of the Penal Code and section 82 of Ordinance No. 159 of 1964, which prohibited the right to strike by public employees under threat of imprisonment.

The Committee had noted that, in the Government's opinion, the abovementioned provisions are in conformity with the Convention, as they do not prohibit public employees from striking. According to the Government, section 374(a) of the Penal Code refers to imprisonment or fine of a public official in the case when he or she, while performing his or her duties, acts with the aim to cause stagnation or to permit the continuation of stagnation, neglects or refuses to perform labour corresponding to his or her inherent duties as a public official. The Government further indicated that section 82(2) of Ordinance No. 159, which states that punishment may be exacted on public employees who neglect or refuse to perform labour as any good public official is expected to perform is aimed at an individual's refusal to perform his or her duties, and not at collective or individual strikes. The Government further indicated that the Penal Code will not be affected by a revision of the labour legislation as the Penal Code falls under the competency of the Ministry of Justice. However, the Code is currently under evaluation by a special committee established in March 2003. It is estimated that its work will be completed in approximately two years. After the evaluation period, the work on the suggested amendments will commence.

The Committee recalls that, in its 1992 report, the Government acknowledged that strikes by public employees, including teachers in the public sector, were forbidden by law (section 347(a) to (c) of the Penal Code and section 82 of Ordinance No. 159 of 1964), although in practice public employees had resorted to strikes on several occasions and that the local courts had considered such strikes to be legal on condition that they were justified. The Committee recalls that the principle whereby the right to strike may be limited or prohibited in the public service or in essential services would become meaningless if legislation defined the public services or essential services too broadly. The Committee considers that the prohibition should be limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or to services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. Noting that the Penal Code is currently under evaluation, the Committee hopes that the Code, as well as section 82 of Ordinance No. 159, will be reviewed in accordance with the Committee's comments and asks the Government to indicate any progress in this respect. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

[The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.]

Nicaragua

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received.

The Committee also notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 29 August 2008 on the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on the previous comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC) in 2005 and 2006, concerning the prosecution of seven trade union leaders, impediments to the registration of the executive board of a trade union and a strike in the education sector that was declared unlawful by the administrative authority.

Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that in its previous observations it asked the Government to amend sections 389 and 390 of the Labour Code which provide for compulsory arbitration of a dispute where 30 days have elapsed since the calling of a strike. The Committee once again points out that, if a dispute is referred to compulsory arbitration after 30 days, the arbitration award should be binding only if all the parties agree to it, or where the strike has been called in an essential service in the strict sense of the term or during an acute national crisis. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the measures taken or envisaged to amend these sections as outlined above.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes that it has not received the Government's report.

The Committee also notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2008, on the application of the Convention. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to send its observations on the comments concerning the imposition of compulsory arbitration and anti-union dismissals in export processing zones and several companies.

Article 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee recalls that, in its previous observation, it noted that the fines envisaged in the legislation (from 2,000 to 10,000 cordobas, with 2,000 cordobas being equivalent to US$147) cannot be considered as dissuasive nor as adequate protection against acts of interference by employers or their organizations in trade union affairs and emphasized the need for the legislation to provide for sanctions that are sufficiently effective and dissuasive against such acts. The Committee reiterates once again the need for the legislation to provide for sanctions that are sufficiently effective and dissuasive against acts of interference by employers or their organizations in trade union affairs and asks the Government to inform it of any measures adopted in this respect in its next report.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that, in its previous observations, it took note of the statistics provided by the Government on the number of collective agreements concluded (and workers covered by them) in both the public and the private sectors and requested the Government to take measures to encourage the negotiation of collective agreements in export processing zones and to provide information in its subsequent report on any measures adopted in this respect. The Committee asks the Government, once again, to take measures to encourage collective bargaining in export processing zones and to keep it informed of any developments in this regard.

Niger

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1961)

Articles 3 and 10 of the Convention. Provisions on requisitioning. The Committee recalls that, for many years, it has been asking the Government to amend section 9 of Ordinance No. 96-009 of 21 March 1996 regulating the exercise of the right to strike of state officials and officials of territorial communities so as to restrict its scope only to cases in which work stoppages are likely to provoke an acute national crisis, to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, or to essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Government had previously indicated that the revision of the abovementioned Ordinance was before the National Tripartite Committee responsible for the implementation of the recommendations produced by the brainstorming meetings to discuss the right to strike and the representativity of organizations. However, in its 2006 report, the Government indicated that the revision of the Ordinance had been hindered by the lack of agreement between the social partners and the Government and by problems relating to the representativity of trade union organizations. The Committee notes with regret that, in its latest report, the Government still does not provide an account of the measures taken to amend section 9 of Ordinance No. 96-009 despite the Committee's repeated requests. The Committee trusts that the Government will not fail to take without delay all the necessary measures to that end and recalls the possibility of seeking technical assistance from the Office in that regard.

Nigeria

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008 concerning legislative issues already raised by the Committee, as well as comments concerning violations of the right to strike, arrest and detention of strikers, police repression during demonstrations and the refusal to recognize a trade union. The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations thereon as well as on the 2006 comments by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC).

The Committee recalls that in its previous observation, it had noted the Trade Union (Amendment) Act (2005) and draws the attention of the Government to the following points.

Article 2 of the Convention. Legislatively imposed trade union monopoly. In its previous comments, the Committee had raised its concern over the legislatively imposed trade union monopoly and in this respect, it requested the Government to amend section 3(2) of the Trade Union Act, which restricts the possibility of other trade unions from being registered where a trade union already exists. The Committee noted that there is no such amendment in the language of the Trade Union (Amendment) Act. The Committee reiterates that under Article 2 of the Convention, workers have the right to establish and to join organizations of their own choosing without distinction whatsoever (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 45). It therefore urges the Government to amend section 3(2) of the principal Trade Union Act so as to ensure that workers have the right to form and join organizations of their own choosing even if another organization already exists.

Organizing in export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee had noted the Government's statement that the Federal Ministry of Labour and Productivity is still in discussion with the EPZ authority on the issues of unionization and entry for inspection in the export processing zones. The Committee notes the ITUC's comments, according to which section 13(1) of the Nigeria Export Processing Zones Authority Decree (1992) makes it difficult for workers to form or join trade unions as it is almost impossible for worker representatives to gain free access to the EPZs. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in the near future to ensure that EPZ workers are guaranteed the right to form and join organizations of their own choosing, as provided by the Convention, and to transmit a copy of any new laws adopted in this respect. It further requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that representatives of workers' organizations have reasonable access to EPZs in order to appraise the workers in the zones of the potential advantages of unionization.

Organizing in various government departments and services. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to amend section 11 of the Trade Union Act, which denied the right to organize to employees in the Customs and Excise Department, the Immigration Department, the Prison Services, the Nigerian Security Printing and Minting Company Limited, the Central Bank of Nigeria, and Nigeria Telecommunications. The Committee notes that this section was not amended by the Trade Union (Amendment) Act. The Committee had noted that according to the Government's statement, the Collective Labour Relations Bill, pending before the lower chamber of Parliament will address this issue. The Committee recalls that workers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish and to join organizations of their choosing and that the only exceptions authorized by the Convention are members of the police and armed forces, who should be defined in a restrictive manner and should not include, for example, civilian workers in the manufacturing establishments of the armed forces. Furthermore, the functions exercised by employees of customs and excise, immigration, prisons and preventive services should not justify their exclusion from the right to organize on the basis of Article 9 of the Convention (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 55 and 56). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 11 of the Trade Union Act, which is still in force, and indicate the progress made towards the adoption of the Collective Labour Relations Bill and send a copy of the legislation, once it is adopted.

Minimum membership requirement. The Committee had previously expressed its concern over section 3(1) of the Trade Union Act requiring 50 workers to form a trade union. The Committee considers that even though this minimum membership would be permissible for industry trade unions, it could have the effect of hindering the establishment of enterprise organizations, particularly in small enterprises. In these circumstances, the Committee is therefore bound to reiterate that this number is too high and requests the Government to take the necessary measures to reduce the minimum membership requirement, particularly in respect of enterprise trade unions, and thus ensure the right of workers to form organizations of their own choosing.

Article 3. The right of organizations to organize their administration and activities and to formulate programmes without interference from the public authorities. Export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that workers in EPZs have the right to freely organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes without interference by the public authorities, including through the exercise of industrial action. Noting the Government's indication that the EPZ authority is not opposed to trade union activities and that the Federal Ministry of Labour and Productivity is still in discussion on this issue, the Committee reiterates its previous request and expects that the necessary measures will be taken without delay so as to ensure that workers in EPZs enjoy the rights under the Convention.

Administration of organizations. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it had requested the Government to amend sections 39 and 40 of the Trade Union Act in order to limit the broad powers of the registrar to supervise the union accounts at any time and to ensure that such a power was limited to the obligation of submitting periodic financial reports, or in order to investigate a complaint. The Committee notes that these sections were not amended under the new legislation and that the Government refers to the Collective Labour Relations Bill. The Committee trusts that the new legislation to which the Government refers will address this matter.

Right to strike. Compulsory arbitration. The Committee had noted that section 30, as amended by subsection (6)(d) of the Trade Union (Amendment) Act, continues to rely on the Trade Disputes Act to restrict strike action through the imposition of a compulsory arbitration procedure leading to a final award. The Committee has already pointed out on several occasions that such a restriction, which is binding on the parties concerned, constitutes a prohibition which seriously limits the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interest of their members, as well as their right to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. Furthermore, the Committee notes the ITUC's comments, according to which section 4(e) of the Nigeria Export Processing Zones Authority Decree (1992) impedes trade unions from handling the resolution of disputes between employers and employees by granting this responsibility to the authorities managing these zones. The Committee recalls that arbitration imposed by the authorities at the request of one party is generally contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements, and thus the autonomy of bargaining partners (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 257). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 7 of Decree No. 7 of 1976, amending the Trade Disputes Act in order to limit the possibility of imposing compulsory arbitration to only essential services in the strict sense of the term, public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in the case of acute national crisis. Also, the Committee requests the Government to amend section 4(e) of the Nigeria Export Processing Zones Authority Decree (1992) in order to guarantee the autonomy of the bargaining partners without giving the right to the authorities to impose compulsory arbitration.

Majority required to declare a strike. The Committee had noted that section 6 of the Trade Union (Amendment) Act amends section 30 of the principal Act by inserting subsection (6)(e), which requires the observance of a simple majority of all registered trade union members for the calling of a strike. The Committee considers that if a member State deems it appropriate to establish in its legislation provisions which require a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 170). It therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the new section 30(6)(e) accordingly, so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

Restrictions relating to essential services. The Committee had noted with concern that section 6 of the new Act relies on the definition of "essential services" provided for in the Trade Disputes Act (1990) to restrict participation in a strike. Specifically, the Trade Disputes Act defines "essential services" in an overly broad manner so as to include, among others, services for or in connection with: the Central Bank of Nigeria, the Nigerian Security Printing and Minting Company Limited, any corporate body licensed to carry out banking business under the Banking Act, the postal service, sound broadcasting, maintaining ports, harbours, docks or aerodromes, transportation of persons, goods or livestock by road, rail, sea or river, road cleaning, and refuse collection. The Committee recalls that essential services are only those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 159). It once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Trade Disputes Act's definition of "essential services".

The Committee reminds the Government that in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of all proportion to the occupational interests of the parties to the dispute, as well as damages to the third parties, namely the users or consumers who suffer the economic effects of collective disputes, the authorities could establish a system of minimum service in services which are of public utility rather than impose an outright ban on strikes, which should be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 160).

Restrictions relating to the objectives of a strike. The Committee had noted with concern section 30 of the Trade Union Act as amended by section 6(d) of the new Act, limiting legal strikes to disputes constituting a dispute of rights, defined as “a labour dispute arising from the negotiation, application, interpretation or implementation of a contract of employment or collective agreement under the Act or any other enactment of law governing matters relating to terms and conditions of employment”, as well as to a dispute arising from a collective and fundamental breach of employment or collective agreement on the part of the employee, trade union or employer. The Committee considers that the legislation appears to exclude any possibility of a legitimate strike action to protest against the Government’s social and economic policy affecting workers’ interests. The Committee recalls that organizations responsible for defending workers’ socio-economic and occupational interests should, in principle, be able to use strike action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by major social and economic policy trends which have a direct impact on their members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection, and the standard of living (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 165). Therefore, it requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 6 of the new Act so as to ensure that workers enjoy the full right to strike and, in particular, to ensure that workers’ organizations may have recourse to protest strikes aimed at criticizing the Government’s economic and social policies without sanctions.

Other restrictions. The Committee had noted that section 42(1)(B) of the Trade Union Act, as amended, requires that “no trade union or registered federation of trade unions or any member thereof shall in the course of any action compel any person who is not a member of its union to join and strike or in any manner whatsoever, prevent aircraft from flying or obstruct public highways, institutions or premises of any kind for the purpose of giving effect to the strike”. The Committee observes that this section appears to provide for two prohibitions: firstly, with regard to compelling non-union members to participate in a strike action and, secondly, the prohibition to obstruct public highways, institutions or premises of any kind for the purpose of giving effect to the strike. The Committee recalls that taking part in picketing and firmly but peacefully inciting other workers to keep away from their workplace should not be considered unlawful. The case is different, however, when picketing is accompanied by violence or coercion of non-strikers. As to the second prohibition, the broad wording of this section could potentially outlaw any gathering or strike picket. The Committee recalls that the conditions that have to be fulfilled under the law in order to render a strike lawful should be reasonable and, in any event, not such as to place substantial limitation on the means of action open to trade union organizations. In addition, given that aircraft-related services, with the exception of air traffic controllers, are not in themselves considered to be essential services in the strict sense of the term, a strike of workers in that sector or related services should not be the subject of an overall ban, as could be implied from the wording of this section. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 42(1)(B) so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention and the above principles, so as to ensure that any restrictions placed on strike actions aimed at guaranteeing the maintenance of public order are not such as to render any such action relatively impossible or ban it for certain workers beyond those in essential services in the strict sense of the term.

Sanctions against strikes. The Committee had noted that section 30 of the Trade Union Act, as amended by section 6(d) of the new Act, makes strikers liable to the possibility of both paying a fine and being imprisoned up to six months, which might lead to a penalty which is disproportionate to the seriousness of the violation. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the principle above.

Article 4. Dissolution by administrative authority. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 7(9) of the Trade Union Act by repealing the broad authority of the Minister to cancel the registration of workers’ and employers’ organizations, as the possibility of administrative dissolution under this provision involved a serious risk of interference by the public authority in the very existence of organizations. The Committee had noted the Government’s statement that this matter will be addressed in the Collective Labour Relations Bill. Noting that section 7(9) of the principal Act is still in force, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend it and to provide a copy of the new legislative Act once it is adopted.

Articles 5 and 6. The right of organizations to establish federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations and the application of the provisions of Articles 2, 3 and 4 to federations and confederations of employers’ and workers’ organizations. The Committee had noted that section 8(a)(1)(b) and (g) of the new Act requires federations to consist of 12 or more trade unions in order to be registered. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the practical application of this requirement and, in particular, the level at which federations are established.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that appropriate measures will be taken in the very near future to make necessary amendments to the laws referred to above in order to bring them into full conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008, concerning refusals to negotiate with trade unions, acts of interference by employers, anti-union practices against workers' representatives, including dismissals. The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations thereon and to reply to the matters raised by the Committee's previous comment which it repeats as follows.

Trade Union (Amendment) Act. In its previous observations, the Committee had commented upon on a section of Decree No. 1 of 1999 which conditioned the provision of check-off facilities upon the insertion of "no strike" and "no lock-out" clauses in relevant collective bargaining agreements. The Committee notes with satisfaction that this provision has been abrogated by the Trade Union (Amendment) Act of 2005. The Committee notes with interest that this new legislation provides that a "membership of a trade union by employees shall be voluntary and no employee shall be forced to join any trade union or be victimized for refusing to join or remain a member".

Bill on collective labour relations. The Committee notes the Government's statement, according to which the National Assembly has not yet passed the bill on collective labour relations. The Committee recalls that ILO technical assistance has been provided to the authorities and hopes that the future legislation will be in full conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to send the new law once adopted.

Comments made by the Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) on the application of the Convention. The Committee notes the comments made by the OATUU in a communication dated 20 August 2004, as well as the ICFTU in communications dated 31 August 2005 and 10 August 2006. The comments concern in particular the fact that: (1) certain categories of worker are denied the right to organize (such as employees of the Customs and Excise Department, the Immigration Department, the Nigerian Security Printing and Mining Company Limited, the Prison Service and the Central Bank of Nigeria) and therefore are deprived of the right to collective bargaining; (2) only unskilled workers are protected by the Labour Act against anti-union discrimination by their employer; (3) every agreement on wages must be registered with the Ministry of Labour, which decides whether the agreement becomes binding according to the Wages Board and Industrial Council Acts according to the Trade Dispute Act (it is an offence for an employer to grant a general or percentage increase in wages without the approval of the Minister); (4) article 4(e) of the 1992 Decree on Export Processing Zones states that "employer-employee" disputes are not matters to be handled by trade unions but rather by the authorities managing these zones; and (5) article 3(1) of the same Decree makes it very difficult for workers to form or join trade unions as it is almost impossible for worker representatives to gain free access to the export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee requests the Government to send its reply on these comments.

Concerning the abovementioned point (1), the Committee observes that the Committee on Freedom of Association has underlined that the functions exercised by employees of customs and excise, immigration, prisons and preventive services should not justify their exclusion from the right to organize on the basis of Article 9 of Convention No. 87 (see 343rd Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, paragraph 1027). The Committee requests the Government to amend section 11 of the Trade Union Act (1973) so that these categories of workers are granted the right to organize and to bargain collectively, as well as for all public employees not engaged in the administration of the State.

Norway

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1949)

Articles 3 and 10 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that over the years, it has referred to the need to limit the possibility of imposing compulsory arbitration to the essential services in the strict sense of the term or to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State.

The Committee takes note of the Government's observations that governmental intervention in strikes can only take place if the Norwegian Parliament (Stortinget) adopts a law and that this does not happen with regard to any collective labour dispute at the discretion of the public authorities, but rather after a careful evaluation of the impact of a strike on the life, health or personal safety of the population. The health surveillance authorities monitor the situation closely and only when it is reported from them that life and health is endangered, is a proposal of compulsory arbitration is put before Parliament. An exception from this has been the oil conflict which would cause a full stop in all Norwegian oil production which would have a devastating impact on volatile and already extremely high oil prices. As for the strike in the elevator service which ended through compulsory arbitration in 2006, the Government indicates that it had lasted for nearly six months and had given rise to safety concerns due to the lack of repairs and maintenance. The Government adds that in 2006, acts imposing compulsory arbitration have been adopted in conflicts in the insurance and financial services sector (Acts Nos 10 and 18 of 16 June 2006). Another intervention took place in the public sector involving the police, Food Safety Authority and Institute of Public Health. With regard to the issue of minimum services, the Government indicates that responsibility for minimum services agreements first of all rests with the conflicting parties which are responsible for the consequences of the industrial action. According to many basic agreements, industrial parties before a conflict breaks out enter into the agreements which are necessary to see to it that the conflict is handled and develops in a secure manner. The Government considers it to be the responsibility of the parties to handle these matters and this is done in most cases.

The Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2545 concerning the imposition of compulsory arbitration in 2006 in the insurance and financial services sectors which are not essential in the strict sense of the term (349th Report, paragraphs 1111–1156). It notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association requested the Government to avoid, in the future, enacting legislation which has the effect of bringing to an end all industrial action in a dispute, especially where it relates to a sector that cannot be considered essential in the strict sense of the term and take into account the possibility of a negotiated minimum service.

The Committee invites the Government once again to ensure that compulsory arbitration through legislative intervention is imposed only in cases where the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population is threatened or where the strike concerns public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, and requests the Government to continue to provide information on any decisions by Parliament imposing compulsory arbitration.

Pakistan

Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11) (ratification: 1923)

The Committee once again notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received.

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the Pakistan Workers Federation (PWF) in a communication dated 21 September 2008, in which it reiterates the information contained in its 2007 communication to the effect that agricultural workers are excluded from the application of the provisions of the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) 2002 and that they have no right to freedom of association.

In its last observation, the Committee had observed that small agricultural holdings which do not run an establishment or farmers working on their own or with their family appeared to be excluded from the IRO 2002 and therefore from the provisions on freedom of association. The Committee notes that the Industrial Relations Act, amending the IRO 2002, was adopted in November 2008 and that it will be an interim law, which will lapse on 30 April 2010. During this period, a tripartite conference will be held to draft a new legislation in consultation with all stakeholders.

Furthermore, with reference to its comments under Convention No. 98, the Committee notes the Government's statement at the Conference Committee in 2006 that the Ministry of Food and Agriculture and provincial governments had been advised to help streamline the work and activities of rural workers' organizations in keeping with the Government's obligations under the Convention and that the Constitution of Pakistan provided clear guarantees to form or join "associations" to all Pakistani citizens, including rural workers. The Committee also notes from the Government's 2006 report on the application of Convention No. 98 that while no trade union of agriculture was registered, there were numerous agricultural workers' associations in place in the country to safeguard their interests.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether these associations enjoy collective bargaining rights under the Pakistani legislation. The Committee expresses the hope that the new legislation will ensure specifically that those engaged in agriculture, that appear to be excluded from the provisions on freedom of association of the IRO 2002, enjoy the same rights of association and combination as industrial workers. It also requests information on the number of trade unions and associations of agricultural workers.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1951)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Pakistan Workers' Federation (PWF) in communications dated 29 August and 21 September 2008, respectively. The comments of both unions concern legislative issues as well as the application of the Convention in practice raised in the previous observation of the Committee. The ITUC further alleges arrest of a number of trade union leaders. The Committee recalls that the right of workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against leaders and members of these organizations and it is for the governments to ensure that this principle is respected. The Committee requests that the Government provide its observations thereon, as well as on the 2005 and 2006 comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), alleging massive arrests and measures of retaliation against strikers, denial of registration of a union, limitation to the right of demonstration, harassment of women trade union leaders, suspension of a trade union and the possible use of section 144 of the Code of Criminal Proceedings against a trade union gathering and the 2005 comments of the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU). The Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2229 (see 349th Report) and 2399 (see 344th and 350th Reports), dealing with the same issues.

The Committee recalls that its previous observations concerned the need to amend the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) 2002. The Committee notes that the Industrial Relations Act, amending the IRO 2002, was adopted in November 2008 and that it will be an interim law, which will lapse on 30 April 2010. During this period, a tripartite conference will be held to draft a new legislation in consultation with all stakeholders. The Committee expresses the hope that the new legislation will take into account its previous comments with regard to the IRO 2002.

In particular, the Committee trusts that the new legislation will guarantee the right to form and join organizations to defend their own social and occupational interests to the following categories of workers:

- managerial and supervisory staff;
- workers who were excluded by virtue of section 1(4) of the IRO 2002, namely workers employed in the following establishments or industries: installations or services exclusively connected with the armed forces of Pakistan including the Ministry of Defence lines of the railways; Pakistan Security Printing Corporation or the Security Papers Limited or Pakistan Mint; administration of the State other than those employed as workmen by the railways, post, telegraph and telephone departments; establishments or institutions maintained for the treatment or care of sick, infirm, destitute and mentally unfit persons excluding those run on a commercial basis; institutions established for payment of employees' old-age pensions or for workers' welfare; and members of the watch and ward, security or fire service staff of an oil refinery or of an establishment engaged in the production, transmission or distribution of natural gas or liquefied petroleum products or of a seaport or an airport;
- workers of charitable organizations;
- workers at the Karachi Electric Supply Company (KESC);
- workers at Pakistan International Airlines (PIA) (Chief Executive's Order No. 6);
- agricultural workers; and
- export processing zone (EPZ) workers.

The Committee further trusts that, under the new legislation, the following restrictions on the right to strike will be lifted:

- the possibility to impose compulsory arbitration at the request of one party to end a strike action (reference is made to sections 31(2) and 37(1) of the IRO 2002). In this respect, the Committee recalls that a provision, which permits either party unilaterally to request the intervention of the public authorities for the settlement of a dispute through compulsory arbitration leading to a final award, effectively undermines the right to strike by making it possible to prohibit virtually all strikes or to end them quickly. Such a system seriously limits the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members as well as their right to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes and is not compatible with Article 3 of the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 153);
- the right of the federal or provincial Government to prohibit a strike which had lasted for more than 15 days at any time before the expiry of 30 days, "if it was satisfied that the continuance of such strike was causing serious hardship to the community or was prejudicial to the national interests" and to prohibit the strike if it considered that it "was detrimental to the interests of the community at large". In this respect, the Committee recalls that prohibitions or restrictions of the right to strike should be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term, or to situations of an acute national crisis. The Committee had previously considered that the wording above, as previously provided for in section 31 of the IRO 2002, was too broad and vague to be limited to such cases;
- sanctions previously imposed by section 39(7) for contravening a labour court's order to call off a strike (dismissal of the striking workers; cancellation of the registration of a trade union; debarring of trade union officers from holding office in that or any other trade union for the unexpired term of their offices and for the term immediately following). In this respect, the Committee recalls that sanctions for strike action should be possible only where the prohibitions in question are in conformity with the principles of freedom of association. Even in such cases, existence of heavy and disproportionate sanctions for strike action may create more problems than they resolve. Since the application of disproportionate sanctions does not favour the development of harmonious and stable industrial relations, the sanctions should not be disproportionate to the seriousness of the violation (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 177 and 178). More specifically, the Committee considers that the cancellation of trade union registration, in view of the serious and far-reaching consequences which dissolution of a union involves for the representation of workers' interests, would be disproportionate even if the prohibitions in question were in conformity with the principles of freedom of association.

The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the new legislation once it is adopted.

The Committee recalls that, in its previous observation, it had noted that under section 32 of the IRO 2002, the federal or provincial Government could prohibit a strike related to an industrial dispute in respect of any public utility services, at any time before or after its commencement, and refer the dispute to a board of arbitrators for compulsory arbitration and that a strike carried out in contravention of an order made under this section was deemed illegal. The Committee had also noted that Schedule I setting out the list of public utility services included services which could not be considered essential in the strict sense of the term – oil production, postal services, railways, airways and ports. The Schedule also mentioned watch and ward staff and security services maintained in any establishment. Furthermore, for a number of years, the Committee had been requesting the Government to amend the Essential Services Act, which included services beyond those which can be considered essential in the strict sense of the term. Considering that essential services are only those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population, the Committee once again requests the Government to amend the Essential Services Act so as to ensure that workers employed in oil production, postal services, railways, airways and ports may have recourse to strike action and so that compulsory arbitration may only be applied in these cases at the request of both parties. The Committee recalls that, rather than imposing a prohibition on strikes, in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of proportion to the occupational interests of the parties to the dispute, as well as damages to third parties, the authorities could establish a system of negotiated minimum service of public utilities. Considering the heavy penal sanctions linked to violation of the Essential Services Act, the Committee further asks the Government to amend this Act so as to ensure that its scope is limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee also requests that the Government specify the categories of workers employed in the “watch and ward staff and security services maintained in any establishment”.

In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government’s indication that measures to review and ultimately reform section 27-B of the Banking Companies Ordinance of 1962 – which restricted the possibility of becoming an officer of a bank union only to employees of the bank in question, under penalty of up to three years’ imprisonment – were under way. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the progress made in repealing these restrictions, either by exempting from the occupational requirement a reasonable proportion of the officers of an organization, or by admitting, as candidates, persons who have been previously employed in the banking company.

The Committee is addressing a direct request on other points directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008, which concern matters raised in the Committee’s previous observation and contain allegations of violations of collective bargaining rights, weak labour law enforcement by the Government, and cases of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon, as well as on the comments sent by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC) on 12 July 2006, also referring to examples of violations of the Convention in law and in practice.

The Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2229 (see 349th Report) and 2399 (see 344th and 350th Reports), dealing with similar issues.

The Committee recalls that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, after noting the long-standing nature and the seriousness of the discrepancies between the Convention and national law, had requested the Government, in June 2006, to send a detailed report containing full information on all issues raised, as well as draft texts concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received.

The Committee recalls that it had previously noted the discussion in the Conference Committee, which took place in June 2006, in which the Government’s representative stated that the Government was working towards resolving these outstanding problems in the near future, in cooperation with workers’ and employers’ organizations.

The Committee recalls that its previous observations concerned the need to amend the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) 2002. The Committee notes that the Industrial Relations Act, amending the IRO 2002, was adopted in November 2008 and that it will be an interim law, which will lapse on 30 April 2010. During this period, a tripartite conference will be held to draft new legislation in consultation with all stakeholders. The Committee expresses the hope that the new legislation will take into account its previous comments with regard to the IRO 2002.

Scope of application of the Convention. (a) Denial of the rights guaranteed by the Convention in export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee had previously noted the Government’s indication that EPZ Employment Relations Rules had been prepared in response to the concerns raised regarding the denial of labour rights in this sector and that these draft rules had been sent to the Ministry of Law, Justice and Human Rights for review and would be provided to the Committee once the process was completed. Hoping that, in the very near future, the new rules will provide EPZ workers with all the rights and guarantees enshrined in the Convention, the Committee once again requests the Government to send a copy of these rules as soon as they are adopted.

(b) Denial of the rights guaranteed by the Convention to other categories of worker. The Committee expresses the hope that the new legislation will guarantee the right to organize of the following categories of worker employed in the following establishments or industries:

- Workers employed in installations or services exclusively connected with the armed forces of Pakistan, including the Ministry of Defence railway lines; the manufacturing establishment of the armed forces; the Pakistan Security Printing Corporation or the Security Papers Limited or Pakistan Mint; establishments or institutions maintained for the treatment or care of sick, infirm, destitute and mentally unfit persons excluding those run on a commercial basis; institutions established for payment of employees' old-age pensions or for workers' welfare; members of the watch and ward, security or fire service staff of an oil refinery or of an establishment engaged in the production, transmission or distribution of natural gas or liquefied petroleum products or of a seaport or an airport, persons who are employed mainly in a managerial or administrative capacity, as well as workers of charitable organizations;
- workers in Pakistan International Airlines (PIAC);
- workers in the agricultural sector;
- workers employed in the Karachi Electric Supply Company (KESC).

The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that after promulgation of the IRO 2002, the KESC workers were entitled to the right of association. However, following an application filed by the Trade Union of the KESC, the National Industrial Relations Commission (NIRC) had issued an order to the effect that the IRO was not applicable to the KESC. The Trade Union of the KESC had appealed to the bench of the NIRC and, according to the Government, the ban on KESC trade union activities had been lifted. The NIRC had further considered a dispute regarding registration of a labour union in the KESC and had ordered that a referendum be held to prepare for the determination of a collective bargaining agent. Following the referendum, labour unions should have been fully restored in the KESC. The Committee requests the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that the KESC workers and the trade union existing in the enterprise enjoy the rights afforded by the Convention in practice and once again requests the Government to indicate the situation including the decision taken by the NIRC on the registration of a labour union and on the determination of a collective bargaining agent.

Article 1 of the Convention. (a) Sanctions for trade union activities. The Committee had previously noted the Government's statement that measures to review and ultimately reform section 27-B of the Banking Companies Ordinance of 1962 – according to which imprisonment and/or fines were imposed in cases which include the use of bank resources (such as telephones) or of carrying on trade union activities during office hours, pressure tactics, etc. – were under way. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will repeal these restrictions in the near future and requests the Government to indicate any developments in this respect.

(b) Lack of sufficient legislative protection for workers dismissed for their trade union membership or activities. The Committee had previously noted the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions' (APFTU) statement, according to which the newly-imposed section 2-A of the Service Tribunals Act had debarred workers engaged in autonomous bodies and corporations such as the Pakistan Water and Power Development Authority (WAPDA), railway, telecommunication, gas, banks, the Pakistan Agricultural Storage and Supply Corporation (PASSCO), etc., from seeking redress for their grievances from the labour courts, labour appellate tribunals and the NIRC in the case of unfair labour practices committed by the employer. In this respect, the Committee had noted the Government's statement at the Conference Committee in June 2006 that measures to review and ultimately reform section 2-A of the Services Tribunal Act were under way. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to reform section 2-A of the Services Tribunal Act and to ensure that appropriate means of redress are available to the workers concerned.

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that workers and employers enjoy adequate protection against any act of interference by each other or each other's agents or members in their establishment. According to the Government, this principle had been applied by means of legislation under which the field formation of the Directorate of Labour Welfare and the Minimum Wages Board had been established, and the workers authorized to form a trade union and determine a collective bargaining agent for executing agreements between the employers and the workers. The Committee once again requests the Government to state in its next report the specific provisions of the legislation which prohibit and penalize acts of interference by organizations of workers and employers (or their agents) in each other's affairs.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. With reference to the new Industrial Relations legislation to be adopted, the Committee expects that it will be in full conformity with Article 4 of the Convention and in particular that it will ensure that:

- if there is no union representing the required percentage to be designated as a collective bargaining agent, collective bargaining rights are not denied to the existing unions, at least on behalf of their own members;
- the three-year time span, within which no application for determination of the collective bargaining agent at the same establishment may be made once a registered trade union has been certified as the collective bargaining agent, is reduced to a more reasonable period or that the challenge of the most representative organization could take place in advance of the expiration of the applicable collective agreement;
- the choice of collective bargaining unit may only be made by the partners themselves, since they are in the best position to decide the most appropriate bargaining level.

The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the new legislation once it has been adopted.

Panama

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received.

The Committee takes note of the comments of 29 August 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention. The Committee notes that the ITUC alleges very serious acts of violence against officials of the Construction and Allied Workers' Union (SUNTRAC) and the arrest of one official of the same union. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on this matter. The Committee further notes the comments of the National Federation of Public Employees and Public Service Enterprise Workers (FENASEP), on issues raised by the Committee.

The Committee recalls that its comments refer to the following matters which raised problems of compliance with the Convention:

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers without distinction whatsoever to establish and join organizations.

- Sections 174 and 178, last paragraph, of Act No. 9 (“establishing and regulating administrative careers”) of 1994, which laid down respectively that there shall not be more than one association in an institution and that associations may have provincial or regional branches, but not more than one branch per province. The Committee observes that Act No. 24 of 2 July 2007 amending and supplementing Act No. 9 on Administrative Careers has not abolished the trade union monopoly imposed by the latter. FENASEP is of the view that these provisions should not be amended because to allow more than one single association or branch would fragment the trade union movement. The Committee points out that although it may be in the workers' interest to avoid a proliferation of trade unions, the unity of the trade union movement should not be imposed by the State through legislative measures, because intervention of this kind is contrary to the principle laid down in Articles 2 and 11 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation to this effect.
- Section 41 of Act No. 44 of 1995 (amending section 344 of the Labour Code) which requires too large a membership (ten) for the establishment of an employers' organization and an even larger membership (40) for the establishment of a workers' organization at the enterprise level; and the requirement of a large number (50) of public servants to establish an organization of public servants under the Act on Administrative Careers. The Committee observes that Act No. 24 of 2 July 2007 amends Act No. 9 on Administrative Careers and provides (section 9) that in an institution where no association exists, 40 public servants are needed in order to constitute an organization of public servants. This number is acceptable to FENASEP. The Committee recalls in this connection that a minimum membership of 40 workers to establish a union would be permissible in the case of industrial unions, but the minimum should be lower in the case of an enterprise union or a base-level union in an establishment so as not to obstruct the creation of such organizations. The Committee also reiterates that a membership of ten for the establishment of an employers' organization is too large and may be an obstacle to the creation of such organizations. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation accordingly.
- Denial to public servants of the right to establish unions. The Government indicated previously that the interpretation by the National Council of Organized Workers (CONATO) was inconsistent with reality; the right of association of public servants is established in Act No. 9 of 20 June 1994 and in practice, FENASEP operates in the same way as any other private sector organization and participates in CONATO and the International Labour Conference. The Committee notes that in its comments, FENASEP states under the Act of Administrative Careers, that non-career public servants, public servants in appointive posts governed by the Constitution, public servants in elective posts and those in service may not organize. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on this point.

Article 3. Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom. Article 64 of the Constitution stipulates that the members of the executive body of a trade union must be of Panamanian nationality. As the Committee has already pointed out, provisions on nationality which are too strict could deprive some workers of the right to elect their representatives in full freedom, for example migrant workers in sectors in which they account for a significant share of the membership. In the Committee's view, the national legislation should allow foreign workers to take up trade union office at least after a reasonable period of residence in the host country (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 118). The Committee accordingly asks the Government to take the necessary steps to have the legislation amended so as to ensure compliance with the abovementioned principle.

Right of organizations to organize their administration. The Committee observes that section 180A of Act No. 24 of July 2007, amending the Administrative Careers Act No. 9, provides that public servants who are not affiliated to the association of public servants and enjoy the improvements obtained in conditions of work will have the ordinary and extraordinary trade union dues deducted from their salaries and paid to the association during the duration of the agreement. In this respect, the Committee considers that imposing by legislative means the payment of an ordinary contribution to the association which obtained improvements in the labour conditions by public servants who are not members raises problems of conformity with the Convention to the extent that it may influence the right of public servants to freely choose the association to which they wish to be affiliated. In these conditions, the Committee requests the Government to modify section 180A of Act No. 24 of July 2007 so as to eliminate the requirement to pay ordinary trade union dues imposed on public servants who are not affiliated to associations, with the possibility of providing, in turn, for the payment of a smaller amount than the ordinary trade union contribution for the benefits derived from collective bargaining.

Right of organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes without interference.

- Denial of the right to strike in export processing zones (Act No. 25). The Committee recalls that the right to strike may be restricted or banned only in the event of an acute national crisis and in respect of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in services which are essential in the strict sense. In the Committee's view, to deny the right to strike in export processing zones is inconsistent with this principle. It therefore asks the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that workers' organizations in these zones may exercise the right to strike.
- Denial of the right to strike in enterprises which have been in existence for less than two years pursuant to Act No. 8 of 1981. CONATO previously pointed out that section 12 of the Act provides that no enterprise shall be compelled to conclude collective agreements during its first two years of operation and that the general legislation allows strikes only in pursuance of collective bargaining or in other limited cases. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to guarantee the right to strike of the workers and their organizations in these enterprises.
- Denial of the right to strike of public servants. The Government indicated previously that the Constitution allows special restrictions in cases determined by law. The Committee recalls that the banning of strikes in the public service should be restricted to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 158). The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps to guarantee the right to strike for public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State.
- Ban on federations and confederations from calling strikes and on strikes against the Government's economic and social policy, and unlawfulness of strikes that are unrelated to an enterprise's collective agreement. The Committee points out that federations and confederations should have the right to strike and that organizations responsible for defending workers' socio-economic and occupational interests should, in principle, be able to use strike action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by major social and economic policy trends which have a direct impact on their members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection and the standard of living (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 165). The Committee requests the Government to take steps to amend the legislation so as to bring it in conformity with these principles and so as not to restrict the right to strike related to a collective agreement.
- Authority of the Regional or General Labour Directorate to refer labour disputes to compulsory arbitration in order to stop a strike in a public service enterprise, including when the service is not essential in the strict sense of the term, such as transport (sections 452 and 486 of the Labour Code). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation to provide that compulsory arbitration is possible in the transport sector only at the request of both parties.
- Obligation to provide minimum services with 50 per cent of the staff in establishments which provide "essential public services" but which go beyond essential services in the strict sense of the term and include transport, and the penalty of summary dismissal of public servants for failure to comply with the requirement concerning minimum services in the event of a strike (sections 152.14 and 185 of Act No. 9 of 1994). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation to ensure that: (1) the organizations of the workers concerned may participate in determining minimum services and the number of workers who are to provide them, and that in the event of disagreement, the matter shall be resolved by an independent body; and (2) the penalty of summary dismissal is abolished.
- Legislation interfering with the activities of employers' and workers' organizations (sections 452.2, 493.1 and 497 of the Labour Code) (closure of the enterprise in the event of a strike and compulsory arbitration at the request of one party). The Committee asks the Government to indicate any amendments envisaged to ensure that compulsory arbitration is allowed only at the request of both parties to the dispute in the case of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, and to ensure that in the event of a strike, the management staff may have access to the enterprise if they so wish.

The Committee notes with regret that the abovementioned discrepancies between Panama's law and practice and the Convention have existed for many years and that some of the restrictions mentioned are serious. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it took note of the Government's statement that it intended to harmonize national law and practice with Conventions Nos 87 and 98, that this would require a tripartite consensus but that there were glaring differences in the views of the social partners. The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps, in consultation with the social partners, to bring the legislation into line with the Convention and with the principles of freedom of association. It requests the Government to report on any measures taken to this end.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It also notes the comments by the National Federation of Public Employees and Public Service Enterprise Workers (FENASEP) referring to issues raised by the Committee, and the comments by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) stating that there are no collective agreements in the export processing zones and that employers interfere in the establishment of trade unions in the building sector. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on these matters.

Articles 1 and 4 of the Convention. The Committee notes with satisfaction that Act No. 24 of 2 July 2007 to amend the Administrative Careers Act contains provisions to protect public servants against acts of anti-union discrimination, and establishes the right of associations of public servants to collective bargaining. The Committee notes, however, that according to FENASEP, the right to collective bargaining has not been regulated. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this regard and to indicate whether municipal workers and workers in decentralized institutions enjoy the right to collective bargaining.

Article 4. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to fulfil the commitments it made to the technical assistance mission carried out in February 2006 to hold meetings with the social partners in the form of seminars or workshops with ILO support and to promote actively tripartite dialogue on the following issues which are pending:

- (a) section 12 of Act No. 8 of 1981 provides that no enterprises (other than building enterprises) shall be required to conclude a collective labour agreement in the first two years of operations, which in practice could involve denial of the right to collective bargaining;
- (b) the need to amend the legislation so that in the case of strikes attributable to the employer, the payment of wages for strike days is not imposed by the legislation (section 514 of the Labour Code) but is a matter for collective bargaining between the parties involved;
- (c) the requirement that the number of representatives of the parties in negotiations shall be from two to five (section 427 of the Labour Code).

In its previous comments the Committee took the view that such restrictions were inconsistent with the Convention and noted that the Government was ready to harmonize national law and practice with the Convention in respect of these provisions if it had the agreement of the employers' and workers' organizations, particularly the National Council of Organized Workers (CONATO) and the National Council of Private Enterprise of Panama (CONEP). Since CONATO and CONEP hold different views, on which it commented in its last observation, the Committee requests the Government to continue to promote tripartite dialogue and to provide information on the activities (seminars and workshops) carried out and on developments on these issues.

The Committee also asked for a tripartite discussion to be held on collective bargaining in the private sector with groups of non-unionized workers (section 431 of the Labour Code), a matter on which the views of the Government, CONATO and CONEP differed. The Committee reminds the Government that collective bargaining with groups of non-unionized workers should be possible only in the absence of a union, and asks the Government to examine this matter in the context of the abovementioned tripartite dialogue so as to ensure that there is no collective bargaining with groups of workers when there is a trade union in the bargaining unit.

Lastly, the Committee took note of restrictions on collective bargaining in the maritime sector pursuant to section 75 of Legislative Decree No. 8 of 1998, which establishes the conclusion of collective agreements as an option, which in practice leads to the denial of workers' claims by employers and about which an application had been lodged for this legislation to be found unconstitutional. The Committee also noted the Government's statement that a draft of a new Maritime Code was to be submitted to the Legislative Assembly. The Committee asks the Government to report on this matter.

Papua New Guinea

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee took note that the third draft Industrial Relations Bill, which was last revised on 14 August 2006 following widespread consultations with the social partners, has entered its third phase, and incorporates some technical inputs provided by the ILO. The said Bill replaces the draft Industrial Relations Act of 2003 as part of an ongoing effort, commenced in 2003, to review and consolidate the labour legislation. To this end, section 257 of the current Bill repeals the Industrial Organizations Act, the Industrial Relations Act, the Industrial Relations (Amendment) Act of 1992, the Industrial Relations (Amendment) Act of 1998, the Public Service Conciliation and Arbitration Act, and the Teaching Service Conciliation and Arbitration Act.

Power of the minister to assess collective agreements on grounds of public interest. Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 32 of the draft Industrial Relations Act of 2003, which confers a broad power on the Minister of Labour to assess collective agreements on grounds of public interest – a principle that also applied to the public sector. The draft legislation had stated that “The minister may, on behalf of the State, appeal as of right against the making of an award or order (including an award or order made by consent) or the certification of an agreement, on the ground that the making of the award or order, or the certification of the agreement, is contrary to public interest”. In this respect, the Committee notes that this provision has been retained in the most recent draft legislation – as section 32(1) of the third draft Industrial Relations Bill. Noting the Government’s indication that section 32 of the draft Bill has been highlighted for further review in January 2007, and that further improvements are needed to ensure the legislation’s compatibility with the Convention, the Committee recalls once again that such legislative provisions will only be compatible with the Convention if they merely stipulate that approval of collective agreements may be refused if the collective agreement has a procedural flaw, or does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by general labour legislation, and requests the Government to take measures to ensure that section 32(1) of the third draft Industrial Relations Bill is in conformity with this principle. The Committee reiterates its hope that the technical assistance currently being provided by the ILO would contribute to the resolution of this matter.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee had previously noted that the previous draft industrial relations legislation appeared to institute a system of compulsory arbitration when conciliation between the parties failed. The Committee notes in this regard that sections 151 and 152 of the previous draft Industrial Relations Act – which appeared to grant the commissioner the authority to commence compulsory arbitration proceedings where the power to initiate conciliation proceedings had not previously been exercised – have been retained as sections 151 and 152 of the third draft Industrial Relations Bill. In this connection, the Committee noted with regret the Government’s indication that it has opted to retain the same approach and system of compulsory arbitration, without significant changes from the previous draft legislation. Nevertheless, the Government had indicated that the sections concerning dispute settlement in the third draft Industrial Relations Bill would be subject to further deliberation at the National Tripartite Consultative Council meeting in early 2007, following which amendments would be drafted by an interim national consultant. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to amend sections 151 and 152 of the third draft Industrial Relations Bill, so as to ensure that compulsory arbitration may only be possible for public servants engaged in the administration of the State or in the framework of essential services in the strict sense of the term.

The Committee expresses its hope that its comments will be fully taken into account in the finalization of the third draft Industrial Relations Bill and asks the Government to transmit a copy of the said legislation once it is adopted.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Paraguay

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the Government’s report, which is basically confined to mentioning the legislative provisions relative to the Convention. The Committee also notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2008. The Committee observes with concern that the ITUC refers to serious acts of violence by the police force against workers from the sugar and steel sectors who participated in demonstrations, as well as the arrest of trade unionists. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on this matter, as well as on the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC) in 2005, which referred, among other things, to numerous acts of violence including assassinations of trade unionists.

The Committee recalls that for many years, it has been making comments on the lack of compliance of various legislative provisions with the Convention.

Article 2 of the Convention. The requirement of an excessively high number of workers (300) to establish a branch trade union (section 292 of the Labour Code). The Committee recalls that, although the requirement of a minimum number of members to be able to establish an organization is not in itself incompatible with the Convention, the minimum number should be fixed in a reasonable manner so that the establishment of organizations is not hindered (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 81). In this regard, the Committee considers that the number of 300 workers to establish a branch trade union is too high and constitutes an obstacle for the establishment by workers of organizations of their own choosing. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation to reduce the requirement of 300 workers to establish a branch trade union to a reasonable number.

The prohibition for workers to join more than one union even if they have more than one part-time employment contract, whether at the level of the enterprise, industry, occupation or trade, or institution (section 293(c) of the Labour Code). The Committee recalls that Article 2 of the Convention establishes the right of workers to join organizations of their own choosing and that, in this respect, workers who have more than one occupation in different enterprises or sectors should be able to join the unions that correspond to each of the categories of work that they perform and to be members, at the same time, if they so wish, of a union at the level of the enterprise and the occupation. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation as indicated above.

Article 3 of the Convention. Imposition of excessive requirements to be able to hold office in the executive body of a trade union: the need to be an employee in the enterprise, industry, occupation or institution, whether active or on leave

(section 298(a) of the Labour Code), to have reached the age of majority and to be an active member of the union (section 293(d) of the Labour Code). The Committee recalls that provisions which require the members of a trade union to belong to the respective occupation and that the officers of the organization be chosen from among its members are contrary to the Convention. Provisions of this type infringe the right of organizations to elect representatives in full freedom by preventing qualified persons, such as full-time union officers, from carrying out union duties or by depriving unions of the benefit of the experience of certain officers when they are unable to provide enough qualified persons from among their own ranks. When national legislation imposes conditions of this kind on all trade union leaders, there is also a real risk of interference by the employer through the dismissal of trade union officers, which deprives them of their trade union office. In order to bring such legislation into conformity with the Convention, it would be desirable to make it more flexible, either by admitting as candidates persons who have previously been employed in the occupation concerned, or by exempting from the occupational requirement a reasonable proportion of the officers of an organization (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 117). Under these conditions, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation (sections 293(d) and 298(a)) in accordance with the principles indicated above.

The requirement that trade unions must comply with all requests for consultations or reports from the labour authorities (sections 290(f) and 304(c) of the Labour Code). The Committee recalls that problems of compatibility with the Convention arise when the law gives the administrative authorities powers to examine the books and other documents of an organization, conduct an investigation and demand information at any time. The Committee considers that such an obligation should be confined to submitting annual financial reports or in cases of denunciations by union members of violations of the law or the union's rules (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 125 and 126). The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend the legislation in accordance with the principle set out above.

The submission of collective disputes to compulsory arbitration (sections 284–320 of the Code of Labour Procedure). In its previous observation, the Committee noted that, according to the Government, these provisions were tacitly repealed by article 97 of the Constitution of the Republic enacted in 1992, which provides that “the State shall facilitate conciliatory solutions to labour disputes and social dialogue. Arbitration shall be optional.” The Committee therefore requests the Government, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution and with a view to avoiding any possible ambiguity of interpretation, to take the necessary measures to explicitly repeal sections 284–320 of the Code of Labour Procedure, which provide for compulsory arbitration in collective disputes.

The requirement that, for a strike to be called, its sole purpose must be directly and exclusively linked to the workers' occupational interests (sections 358 and 376(a) of the Labour Code). The Committee reminds the Government that trade union organizations, which are responsible for defending the socio-economic and occupational interests of workers, should, in principle, be able to use strike action in support of their positions in the search for solutions to problems posed by major economic and social policy trends which have a direct impact on their members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection and standards of living. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend sections 358 and 376 in accordance with the principle recalled above.

Section 362 of the Labour Code which establishes the obligation to ensure a minimum service in the event of a strike in public services that are essential to the community, without the requirement to consult the employers' and workers' organizations concerned. The Committee recalls that workers' organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining minimum services along with employers and the public authorities, and that any disagreement as to the number and duties of the workers concerned should be settled by an independent body and not unilaterally by the administrative authorities. Under these conditions, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee explicitly in the legislation the right of workers' and employers' organizations to participate in defining minimum services and, where disagreements arise, as to the number and duties of the workers concerned, they should be settled by an independent body.

In view of the fact that the Committee has been making these comments for many years, without progress being achieved in practice, it strongly encourages the Government to take the necessary measures to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention without delay. The Committee urges the Government to seek technical assistance from the Office to that end.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 98th Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2009.]

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report which basically limits itself to mentioning the legislative provisions relating to the Convention.

The Committee also notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2008 referring to matters already raised by the Committee and also to acts of anti-union discrimination (dismissals of trade union leaders and members for exercising their union rights) and an act of interference by an enterprise in the internal affairs of a trade union. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in this respect. The Committee also requests the Government once again to send its observations on the comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC) of 2005 referring to: (1) acts of anti-union discrimination against trade union leaders and members and delays in the administration of justice; and (2) the fact that collective agreements must be submitted to compulsory arbitration, and also the comments of the Trade Union of Maritime Dock Workers of Asunción (SEMA) regarding interference by employers in that sector through the creation of trade unions favourable to the enterprise.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of discrimination and anti-union interference. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on:

- the absence of legal provisions affording protection to workers who are not trade union leaders against all acts of anti-union discrimination (article 88 of the Constitution affords protection only against discrimination based on trade union preferences); and
- the absence of adequate penalties for non-observance of the provisions relating to the employment stability of trade unionists and to acts of interference in workers' and employers' organizations by each other (the penalties laid down in the Labour Code for failure to comply with the legal provisions on this point in sections 385, 393 and 395 are not a sufficient deterrent).

The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it noted that, except in the case of repeated anti-union acts by the employer, the penalties established are not a sufficient deterrent. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary steps to adopt provisions which provide adequate protection through deterrent penalties against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference and to keep the Committee informed of all further developments.

The Committee also requests the Government once again to provide information on the steps taken to overcome the problem of delays in the application of justice in relation to acts of anti-union discrimination and interference.

Article 6. Public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it considered that sections 49 and 124 of the Public Service Act do not afford adequate protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination within the meaning of Article 1 of the Convention (which not only covers dismissal but also transfers and other prejudicial measures) and recalled that the protection afforded to workers and trade union officials against acts of anti-union discrimination constitutes an essential aspect of freedom of association (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 202 and 203). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to establish in the legislation adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination against public servants, including those who are not trade union leaders, and also sufficiently dissuasive sanctions for those who commit violations.

Bearing in mind that it has been making these comments for many years without progress being achieved in practice, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to avail itself of technical assistance from the Office to this end.

[The Government is requested to report in detail in 2009.]

Peru

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made by the National Union of Public Employees of the Armed Forces (SINEP-FFAA) dated 7 April 2006, concerning the refusal to grant it legal personality, in which it reports that, in a decision of 3 May 2006, the trade union organization was registered automatically.

The Committee also notes the comments made by the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP), dated 23 January and 16 May 2007, which refer to the following violations of the trade union rights of the Single Union of Public Education Workers (SUTEP): (1) the declaration of regular basic education as an essential service by means of Act No. 28988 of 19 March 2007, and (2) the creation of the national register of supply teachers to replace teachers on strike by means of Ministerial Decision No. 0080-2007-ED of 23 February 2007.

With regard to the declaration of regular basic education as an essential service (Act No. 28988), the Committee observes that, under section 82 of the Industrial Relations Act, the sole purpose of such declaration is to ensure minimum services in the event of a strike. In this regard, the Committee considers that the declaration of regular basic education as an essential service for the purposes of imposing a minimum service does not raise problems of conformity with the Convention.

With regard to the creation of the national register of supply teachers to replace teachers on strike (Ministerial Decision No. 0080-2007-ED), the Committee recalls that strikers should only be replaced: (a) in the case of a strike in an essential service in the strict sense of the term in which strikes are prohibited by the legislation, and (b) if the strike results in an acute national crisis. Under these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal Ministerial Decision No. 0080-2007-ED on the replacement of teachers on strike.

The Committee also notes the comments made by: (1) the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008, which refer to serious acts of violence against demonstrators and the arrest of trade union leaders for participating in a strike; (2) the Autonomous Confederation of Peruvian Workers (CATP), sent with the Government's report, which refer to the refusal to register the Union of Workers of the Public Ombudsperson, and the hiring of workers to replace State workers on strike; and (3) the National Coordinating Committee of Ministry of Health Workers, dated 3 October 2008. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on this subject.

Furthermore, the Committee notes the various cases currently before the Committee on Freedom of Association relating to matters being examined by the Committee.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation, it noted a bill approving mechanisms to ensure transparency in the election of executive boards of trade unions, federations and confederations of public sector workers, which amends section 5(a) of Act No. 26487 (Basic Act on the National Register of Identity and Civil Status) and section 5 of Act No. 26486 (Basic Act on the National Elections Commission), which contained various provisions which were not in conformity with the Convention. In this regard, the Committee notes with interest that this bill was shelved permanently on 13 December 2007.

Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that for many years, it has been making comments on the following provisions of the Industrial Relations Act:

- The power of the labour administration to determine minimum services, in the event of disagreement, when a strike is declared in essential public services (section 82). In this regard, the Committee recalls that since minimum services restrict one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 161) and, in the event of disagreement with regard to the establishment of this minimum service, the legislation should provide for the disagreement to be settled by an independent body and not by the labour authority.
- Section 73(b) which provides that the decision to call a strike has to be adopted in the form expressly set out in the statutes and must in any event represent the will of the majority of the workers concerned. In this regard, the Committee recalls that if the legislation provides that a vote is required by workers before a strike can be held, it should be ensured that account is taken only of the votes cast, and that the required quorum or majority are fixed at a reasonable level (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 170).

The Committee also recalls that in its previous comments, it noted the drafting of the General Labour Bill which repealed the Industrial Relations Act and therefore the provisions in question, and asked the Government to provide information on the progress of the abovementioned Bill. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government points out in its report that, in September 2006, the Congressional Committee on Labour entrusted to the National Council for Labour and Employment Promotion (CNTPE) the revision of the General Labour Bill. To that end, the CNTPE appointed an ad hoc committee whose work was ratified by the plenary meeting of the CNTPE on 27 October 2006 and referred to the Congressional Labour Committee. The Bill is currently on the agenda of the plenary of the Congress for discussion. The Committee hopes that the General Labour Act adopted will be in complete conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on developments relating to this Bill in its next report and whether it amends the sections in question.

Article 6. Right of workers' organizations to establish federations and confederations. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it asked the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 19 of Supreme Decree No. 003-82-PCM to allow federations and confederations of public servants to establish or join organizations of their own choosing. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government points out that, under Supreme Decree No. 003-2004-TR (which created the Register of Trade Union Organizations of Public Servants (ROSSP)) and Directive No. 001-2004-DNRT (on guidelines for the registration of trade union organizations with the Register of Trade Union Organizations of Public Servants of the Ministry of Labour and Employment Promotion), federations of State workers who are covered by different labour regimes (private or public sector) are allowed to join and form confederations. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether, in accordance with these provisions, federations of State workers are allowed to join confederations which include organizations of private sector workers.

Furthermore, the Committee addresses a direct request to the Government on other matters.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments from the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP) dated 23 January and 16 May 2007.

The Committee also notes the comments from the National Coordinating Committee of Subcontracted Workers of the Ministry of Health dated 3 October 2008. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments in this respect.

The Committee also notes the various cases before the Committee on Freedom of Association which refer to the matters set out below.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it has been referring for a number of years to: (1) the lack of penalties for acts of interference by employers with regard to trade union organizations; and (2) the slowness of judicial procedures for dealing with complaints of anti-union discrimination or interference. The Committee notes that the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) refers in its comments to anti-union dismissals in various sectors.

The Committee notes with interest that, according to the Government's report, section 25 of the Regulations relating to the General Labour Inspection Act, approved by Supreme Decree No. 019-2006-TR, as amended by Supreme Decree No. 019-2007-TR, classifies interference by the employer in the freedom of association of the worker or trade union and anti-union discrimination as serious offences. If these offences are proven during an inspection procedure, the applicable penalty varies between 5 per cent of 11 tax units (UITs) (1,925 nuevos soles, equivalent to US$630) and 100 per cent of 20 tax units (70,000 nuevos soles, equivalent to US$22,500), depending on the number of workers affected.

The Government adds that the draft General Labour Act prohibits interference (section 332) and anti-union discrimination (sections 355 and 358). With regard to the need to expedite proceedings, the draft Act also provides that any worker or trade union organization that considers that its rights with regard to freedom of association have been violated or are under immediate threat shall have the right of action via summary proceedings (section 353). In the event of the dismissal of workers who have trade union immunity, the judge may order the suspension of the effects of the dismissal at the worker's request; within three days the employer must demonstrate that the dismissal did not take place on anti-union grounds, and within the following two days, the judge must rule on the matter (section 356). The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the penalties laid down in the Regulations relating to the General Labour Inspection Act will continue to apply once the General Labour Act has been adopted.

Finally, with regard to the question of the level at which collective bargaining should take place in the construction sector, the Committee observes that the Government has not sent its comments in this respect. The Committee observes that this matter was dealt with by the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 2375) on the basis of a decision by the Supreme Court of Justice determining that such collective bargaining should take place at the level of the branch of activity. The Committee recalls that the level at which bargaining takes place must be the subject of negotiation between the parties.

Philippines

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It also notes the lengthy comments communicated by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in communications dated 29 August and 1 September 2008, the Kilosang Mayo Uno in a communication dated 15 September 2008, and the Public Services Labor Independent Confederation (PSLINK) in a communication dated 15 September 2008. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these comments.

Civil liberties. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of information provided by the ITUC in 2006 and 2007 with regard to numerous reported violations of trade union rights, including killings, attempted murders, death threats, abductions, disappearances, assaults, torture, military interference in trade union activities, violent police dispersion of marches and pickets, arrests of trade union leaders in connection with their activities and widespread impunity for the perpetration of such acts. The Committee also takes note in this context of the interim conclusions and recommendations reached in November 2008 by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2528 (351st Report, paragraphs 1180–1240) which concerns similar allegations. The Committee finally takes note of the recommendations made by the Independent Commission to address media and activist killings created under Administrative Order No. 157 of 2006 by the President of the Philippines (Melo Commission: report issued on 27 January 2007); the UN Special Rapporteur on Extrajudicial Summary or Arbitrary Executions on his mission to the Philippines of 12–21 February 2007 (Special Rapporteur: document A/HRC/8/3/Add.2, issued on 16 April 2008); and the National Consultative Summit on Extrajudicial Killings and Enforced Disappearances: Searching for Solutions (National Consultative Summit), which was hosted by the Supreme Court on 16–17 July 2007 in Manila.

The Committee recalls the information previously communicated by the Government emphasizing the steps taken to address this serious situation, i.e. the establishment of the Melo Commission and the subsequent creation of special regional tribunals, the ongoing review of the rules of court, the establishment of the task force USIG of the Philippine National Police and the hosting by the Supreme Court of the National Consultative Summit. It further notes from information provided by the ITUC in 2008, the introduction by the Supreme Court of the new writ of protection of constitutional rights (amparo) procedure since September 2007; this habeas corpus-like procedure compels state agencies to reveal to the court the whereabouts of named persons, disclose documentary evidence, or allow court-authorized searches of premises.

The Committee notes that in its latest communications of 29 August and 1 September 2008, the ITUC provides additional detailed information, accompanied by hundreds of pages of human rights reports and newspaper articles, on the human rights situation more generally and systematic violations of the fundamental human rights and civil liberties of trade unionists. In particular, the Committee notes that, according to the ITUC, despite measures previously announced by the Government to address the issues, few improvements have been observed in practice and there is an “abysmal failure” to investigate or prosecute the perpetrators of such acts, leading to an ongoing climate of impunity and impassivity in the face of continuing violence against trade unionists. The ITUC refers to continuing extrajudicial killings in 2007 and 2008 with a total of 87 unionists killed since 2001. Five trade union leaders and members had been murdered and three trade unionists abducted between July 2007 and August 2008. The ITUC also refers to violent dispersal of workers’ protests, intimidation, threats and blacklisting of trade unionists. It also refers to the militarization of workplaces especially in export processing zones (EPZs) and special economic zones, and constant surveillance and harassment of trade unions opposing the economic development model and their leaders, some of whom have been reportedly forced to constantly move houses to avoid persecution. The Committee further notes that the ITUC cites the findings and detailed recommendations of the UN Special Rapporteur (see document cited above) and expresses concern that the ineffectiveness of the measures taken so far by the Government to address the situation as, out of hundreds of killings and “disappearances” over the past five years, there have been only two successfully prosecuted cases resulting in the conviction of four persons (for acts not directed against trade unionists).

The Committee recalls that the Conference Committee in 2007 requested the Government to accept a high-level ILO mission so as to obtain a greater understanding of all aspects of this case. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not yet accepted such a mission.

The Committee observes with deep regret that there has been no information on any conviction pronounced against the perpetrators and instigators of acts of extreme gravity against trade unionists and that killings, abductions, enforced disappearances and other violations of fundamental rights of trade unionists continue to take place. The Committee recalls that the absence of judgements against the guilty parties creates, in practice, a situation of impunity which reinforces the climate of violence and insecurity, and which is extremely damaging to the exercise of trade union rights. The Committee emphasizes that the rights of workers’ organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations, and it is for governments to ensure that this principle is respected. The Committee stresses the importance of ensuring that all instances of violence against trade union members and leaders are properly investigated and that any evidence of impunity is firmly combated to ensure the full and free exercise of trade union rights and their accompanying civil liberties. It emphasizes that the Government has the duty to defend a social climate where respect for the law reigns as the only way for guaranteeing respect for and protection of individuals. All appropriate measures should be taken to guarantee that, irrespective of trade union affiliation, trade union rights can be exercised in normal conditions with respect for basic human rights and in a climate free of violence, pressure, fear and threats of any kind.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated with a view to putting an immediate end to the climate of violence and impunity which is extremely damaging to the exercise of trade union rights and ensuring the prompt investigation, prosecution, trial and conviction of those found guilty of murders, enforced disappearances and other violations of fundamental human rights against trade unionists.

Legislative issues. Human Security Act. The Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC on the Act to Secure the State and Protect Our People from Terrorism (No. 9371) otherwise known as the Human Security Act. According to the ITUC, the vague definition of terrorism in this Act as a criminal act that “causes widespread and extraordinary fear and panic among the populace” can serve as a legal umbrella for extrajudicial killings and can lead to categorizing peaceful demonstrations like strikes and protests on social issues as “terrorism”.

The Committee notes that, despite a request by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2007, the Government has not provided any information on the impact of the Human Security Act upon the application of the provisions of the Convention, apart from the text of the Act itself. The Committee requests the Government to provide such information and, in particular, to indicate the safeguards which ensure that the Human Security Act cannot be used under any circumstances as a basis for suppressing legitimate trade union activities or result in any extrajudicial killing for the exercise of trade union rights.

Other legislative issues. In the absence of new information by the Government, the Committee reiterates the requests that it has been making for a number of years on certain discrepancies between the provisions of the national laws and the Convention:

- The need to amend section 234(c) of the Labor Code, which requires, for registration of a trade union organization, the names of all its members comprising at least 20 per cent of all employees in a bargaining unit where it seeks to operate; the Committee recalls that, according to the statement of the Government representative before the Conference Committee in June 2007, an Act had been adopted in May 2007 which sought to lift the 20 per cent requirement and the requirement to reveal the names of the officers and members, for legitimate federations and national unions; however, the 20 per cent membership requirement was still relevant in the case of unions seeking independent registration. The Committee once again requests the Government to communicate the text of the relevant Act and to indicate in its next report measures taken or contemplated with a view to lowering the minimum membership requirement for registration of independent trade unions.

- The need to amend sections 269 and 272(b) of the Labor Code, so as to grant the right to organize to all nationals lawfully residing within the Philippines (and not just those with valid permits if the same rights are guaranteed to Filipino workers in the country of the alien workers, or if the country in question has ratified either ILO Convention No. 87 or No. 98). The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information in its next report on measures taken or contemplated so as to amend the above-noted sections in a manner which enables anyone legally residing in the country to benefit from the trade union rights provided by the Convention.
- The need to amend section 263(g) of the Labor Code so as to limit governmental intervention resulting in compulsory arbitration to the essential services in the strict sense of the term only; amend sections 264(a) and 272(a) of the Labor Code, which provide for dismissal of trade union officers and penal liability to a maximum prison sentence of three years for participation in illegal strikes, so as to ensure that workers may effectively exercise their right to strike without the risk of being sanctioned in a disproportionate manner; lower the excessively high requirement of ten union members for federations or national unions set out in section 237(a) of the Labor Code; and amend section 270, which subjects the receipt of foreign assistance to trade unions by the prior permission of the Secretary of Labor. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending the aforementioned legislative provisions so as to bring them into full conformity with the Convention.

Furthermore, the Committee reiterates its previous request to the Government to continue to provide information on unionization levels in the EPZs. The Committee takes note of the comments made by the ITUC on this issue, which are examined under Convention No. 98.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It also notes the lengthy comments communicated by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in communications dated 29 August and 1 September 2008; the Kilosang Mayo Uno in a communication dated 15 September 2008; and the Public Services Labor Independent Confederation (PSLINK) in a communication dated 15 September 2008. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these comments.

1. Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee notes that for several years it has been requesting the Government to respond to comments made by the ITUC with regard to numerous acts of anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee notes the latest detailed comments made by the ITUC, reporting extensive anti-union discrimination and employer interference, cases of replacement of trade unions by non-independent company unions, dismissals and blacklisting of activists in export processing zones (EPZs) and other special economic zones. The ITUC also referred in its 2006–07 comments to an order promulgated in 2004 (the labour standards enforcement framework) which essentially abandons the principle of government labour inspection for workplaces with more than 200 workers; self-regulation will be conducted in large companies at least once a year by an employer–worker committee based on a government-issued checklist and in companies where there is a registered collective bargaining agreement.

The Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in several cases concerning acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, the most recent being Case No. 2488 which illustrates the considerable difficulties faced by workers in their efforts to have their grievances examined through protracted litigation and long and complex judicial proceedings which give rise to a situation of prolonged legal uncertainty (350th Report, paragraph 202).

The Committee emphasizes that Article 3 of the Convention requires effective machinery for the purpose of ensuring respect for the right to organize as defined in Articles 1 and 2. Acts of anti-union discrimination and interference are serious violations of the right to organize as they may jeopardize the very existence or independence of trade unions. Thus, the Committee stresses that national procedures against such acts should be prompt and accompanied by appropriate remedies and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions.

Noting that certain of the reported acts of anti-union discrimination and interference relate to certification procedures and elections, the Committee notes that according to information provided by the Government to the Committee on Freedom of Association in the context of Case No. 2252, House Bill No. 1351, which has been approved by the House of Representatives and is currently being considered by the Senate, seeks, among other things to: (1) eliminate employer interference, which is, according to the Government, an incessant cause of delay in certification proceedings; (2) restrict the grounds for cancellation of union registration; and (3) clarify that the filing of a petition for cancellation of registration does not suspend a petition for certification election (346th Report, paragraph 176).

The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report a copy of House Bill No. 1351 and to indicate any developments as well as any additional legislative or other measures taken or contemplated to accelerate the procedures and strengthen in practice the protection available against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, with special emphasis on EPZs and special economic zones. The Committee also requests the Government to provide statistical information on the number of complaints of unfair practices and inspections carried out on these matters in EPZs and special economic zones.

Article 4. Development of collective bargaining in the public sector. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of the Government's indication that, under section 13 of Executive Order No. 180, only terms and conditions not otherwise fixed by law may be negotiated between public sector employees' organizations and the Government authorities. The Government had further stated that such matters as the scheduling of vacation leave, the work assignment of pregnant women and recreational, social, athletic and cultural activities are negotiable; however, matters relating, inter alia, to wages and all other forms of pecuniary remuneration, retirement benefits, appointment, promotion, and disciplinary action are not negotiable. The Committee recalls in this connection that article 276 of the Labour Code provides that the terms and conditions of employment of all Government employees, including employees of government-owned and controlled corporations, shall be governed by the civil service law, rules and regulations, and that their salaries shall be standardized by the National Assembly as provided for in the new Constitution. The Committee notes, moreover, that the ITUC confirms these restrictions on bargaining rights in the public sector. In these circumstances, while recalling that the Convention is compatible with systems requiring parliamentary approval of certain labour conditions or financial clauses of collective agreements, as long as the authorities respect the agreement adopted, the Committee once again recalls the importance of the development of collective bargaining in the public sector and repeats its firm hope that the amendments to the Labour Code or other legislation would be adopted in the near future and that it will fully grant to public sector employees not engaged in the administration of the State the right to negotiate their terms and conditions of employment in accordance with Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention. It once again requests the Government to indicate the developments in this regard and provide copies of any legislation once adopted.

Poland

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the 2006 comments submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). Regarding the Road Traffic Law (1997), which the ICFTU considered made it almost impossible for trade unions to organize legal demonstrations and rallies, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it no longer applies to assemblies and strikes, following the 2006 decision of the Polish Constitutional Tribunal. Furthermore, the Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC, previously ICFTU) in a communication dated 29 August 2008 concerning violent dispersion of a sit-in organized by the healthcare workers affiliated to the All-Poland Trade Union Alliance (OPZZ). The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations thereon, as well as on the 2006 ICFTU comments alleging that workers in state-owned enterprises in health sector, water and forestry industries had their employment contracts terminated and replaced by individual contracts so that they could no longer be trade union members.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend section 49(6) so as to ensure that public servants may exercise their trade union functions at all levels. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the Council of Ministers directed to the Sejm (the lower chamber of the Parliament) a draft Act on amending the Law on Civil Service. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that the draft provides an amendment of article 49(6) of the Civil Service Act of 24 August 2006, which shall read as follows: "civil service member occupying a higher civil service post cannot perform any trade union function". The Committee considers that some categories mentioned by the Government, as included in section 49(6) of the draft (deputies of voivodship veterinary offices, persons in charge and deputies of organizational units in the Central Inspectorate of Trade Inspection, Office for Registration of Medicinal Products, Medical Devices and Biocidal Products, and Office for Forest Seed Production) are covered by the Convention and therefore should be able to exercise trade union functions. The Committee hopes that the draft Act will take into account its comments and requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Right of organizations freely to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend section 49(3) of the Law on Civil Service (2006) so as to ensure that prohibition of the right to strike is limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the draft Act does not propose to amend section 49(3) of the abovementioned Law. According to the Government, the civil service concerns government administration exclusively, thus it should be assumed that civil service members participate in exercising authority on behalf of the State. Civil service members may, however, undertake protest actions which do not disturb normal functioning of offices. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that all employees employed in the state authorities, government and self-government administrations, courts and prosecutor's office are not entitled to the right to strike. The Committee requests the Government to specify categories of employees whose right to strike is restricted under section 49(3) of the Law on Civil Service.

Trade union assets. With regard to its previous request to provide information on the proceedings before the Social Revendication Commission and the administrative courts concerning trade union assets, the Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the Commission ruled in favour of the NSZZ Solidarnosc and obliged the State Treasury to pay the trade union organization concerned the amount it claimed along with the statutory interest due on the date of the decision.

The Committee notes that the Labour Code of 1974 was amended in 2008. It therefore requests the Government to provide a copy of the amended Code.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the Government's detailed report in reply to the previous comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) alleging several cases of anti-union discrimination, interference in trade union affairs and infringement of collective bargaining rights.

Article 1 of the Convention. Insufficient protection against anti-union discrimination. The Committee had requested the Government to give consideration, in full consultation with the social partners concerned, to the establishment of prompt and impartial procedures, in order to ensure that trade union officials and members have the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2395 and 2474 (see 349th Report) concerning excessive delay in processing cases of anti union discrimination. In this regard, the Committee notes from the Government's report that this issue has been discussed in the Tripartite Commission. According to the Government, a draft amendment of the Code of Civil Procedure contains rules aiming to facilitate access for parties to proceedings. Moreover, the Labour Code has been amended through an Act of 9 May 2008.

In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government recalls that a number of acts of anti union discrimination constitute offences which involve penal sanctions and proceedings which could be referred, if necessary, to a simplified procedure; moreover, cases of undue delay allow the authorities to take appropriate legal measures, including the granting of an appropriate sum of money. The Committee notes that the 2008 ITUC comments concerning the excessive delays of the proceedings and stating that often the judicial orders for reinstatement of trade unionists are ignored by employers.

The Committee concludes that in practice the proceedings need to be more prompt and efficient. Thus, the Committee requests the Government to evaluate the results of the amendments to the Labour Code, in 2008, and the draft Code of civil procedure in consultation with the social partners and to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated to ensure that trade union officials and members have in practice the right to prompt and effective remedy by the competent national tribunals against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of complaints for anti-union discrimination, the average duration of the proceedings and the outcomes of these proceedings. The Committee will examine the amended Labour Code and the draft of the Code of civil procedure, once a translation becomes available.

Article 4. Infringement of collective bargaining rights. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the 2008 ITUC comments regarding alleged instances of employers' refusal to negotiate collective agreements or to comply with them. In this regard, the Committee takes note of the Government's statement according to which the duty of the parties to conduct negotiations is not accompanied by sanctions; the Minister of Labour has urged the social partners to take measures that would activate an autonomous dialogue, in view of the Act on the Tripartite Commission, and encouraged them to use collective agreements more openly.

The Committee notes the statistics provided by the Government on the collective agreements and protocols registered, as well as the 12 cases of complaints concerning employers' refusal to negotiate in 2006 and 2007 (most of them were solved due to the interventions of the labour inspectors). The Committee invites the Government and the social partners to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to resolve cases of refusal to bargain so as to promote collective bargaining.

Portugal

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Confederation of Portuguese Industry (CIP) on 17 July 2008, and by the General Union of Workers (UGT) on 11 August 2008, on the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes the comments made by the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers (CGTP) on matters which have already been dealt with.

Article 4 of the Convention. Compulsory arbitration. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it referred to the new Labour Code which, in section 567, provides that, in disputes arising from the conclusion or revision of a collective agreement, recourse to arbitration may be compulsory where, after protracted and fruitless negotiations and after conciliation and mediation procedures have been exhausted, the parties do not agree, within two further months after such procedures, to refer the dispute to voluntary arbitration. The Committee notes that the CIP criticises this provision and considers it to be contrary to the principle of voluntary and free negotiation enshrined in the Convention. The Committee duly notes the Government's indication that, since the introduction of compulsory arbitration in Portuguese legislation in 1992, there have been no cases of compulsory arbitration. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration is an acceptable means of ending a collective labour dispute when it is at the request of the two parties or when the dispute involves public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or employed in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely services the interruption of which might endanger the life, health or safety of all or part of the population. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to align the legislation and the existing practice in the country with the above principle.

Representativity of organizations. The Committee had asked the Government, in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers, to determine and establish objective, precise and predetermined criteria to evaluate the representativity and independence of employers' and workers' organizations and to amend the legislation (Act No. 108/91 of the Economic and Social Council (CES), section 9, concerning the Permanent Commission for Social Partnership (CPCS)), so that it does not refer by name to the workers' organizations which are to be members of the CES and the CPCS. The Committee notes the information from the Government that it suggested to the social partners within the CPCS to agree on permanent criteria for determining representativity, in April 2008, but, in the absence of any such agreement, they decided to postpone dealing with this matter. The Committee considers that the legislation should be amended so that it does not refer by name to the workers' organizations which are to be members of the CES and the CPCS, in order to avoid the exclusion of certain representative organizations from these bodies in the future. Furthermore, the Committee considers that legislative measures should be taken to determine and establish objective, precise and predetermined criteria to evaluate the representativity and independence of employers' and workers' organizations.

The Committee hopes that the CPCS will examine these questions with a view to legislative reform and requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard.

Romania

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee takes note of the communication by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2008, referring to the need for specialized labour courts to improve the enforcement of labour legislation and the Government's reply.

The Committee also takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2509 (344th Report, paragraphs 1216–1248).

The Committee takes note of the report of the technical assistance mission to Romania which took place in May 2008 in the context of the follow-up to the conclusions reached by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2007.

The Committee notes with interest from the Government's report that pursuant to the ILO mission, the social partners that are representative at the national level in Romania, as well as representatives of the Government, signed a memorandum in which they agreed to improve the legal framework on labour and social dialogue and to request specialized ILO technical assistance on the legislative texts concerning: the right to freedom of association for trade unions and employers' organizations (Act No. 54/2003 which according to the Government, is currently under discussion before Parliament); collective agreements (Act No. 130/1996); and settlement of industrial disputes (Act No. 168/1999). These issues have been included in the 2008-09 Decent Work Agenda concerning Romania as a result of extensive consultations carried out between the Ministry of Labour, Family and Equal Opportunities and the representative social partners, as well as the ILO, on 8 and 17 July 2008. A tripartite working group has been set up in order to examine amendments to the abovementioned Acts. In this framework, all the issues previously raised by the Committee will be examined with a view to their resolution. During the International Labour Conference of 2008, a timetable has been adopted for the work of this working group. At present, the working group focuses on a draft bill to amend Act No. 130/1996 on trade unions.

The Committee recalls that the issues raised in its previous comments are the following:

- the need to amend section 62 of Act No. 168/1999 on the settlement of labour disputes (according to which the management of a production unit may submit a dispute to an arbitration commission in the event that a strike has lasted for 20 days without any agreement being reached between the parties and its continuation would affect humanitarian interests) so that compulsory arbitration may only be imposed in essential services in the strict sense of the term and for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State;

- the need for detailed information on the application of sections 55 and 56 of Act No. 168/1999 on the settlement of labour disputes (according to which the management of a production unit may demand the suspension of a strike, for a maximum period of 30 days, if it endangers the life or health of individuals, and an irrevocable decision may be taken in this respect by the Court of Appeal) and 58–60 of the same law (under which, the management can request the Court to pronounce itself on the illegality of a strike and its ending by issuing an urgent ruling within three days), and to provide copies of decisions handed down under these provisions;
- the need to continue to provide information on the application in practice of section 12(e) of Act No. 168/1999 on the settlement of labour disputes (according to which a conflict of interest can be declared in case the parties fail to reach agreement in the framework of the compulsory annual negotiations concerning wages, working hours, the work programme and work conditions), in the light of previous comments made by workers' organizations on the distinction between conflicts of interests and conflicts of rights which is reportedly applied in practice in a selective manner and on a case by case basis, leading to uncertainty on whether trade unions will be able to exercise the right to strike in each case.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to address the above issues and to provide the information requested by the Committee.

The Committee notes that in Case No. 2509 the Committee on Freedom of Association requested the Government to amend section 66(1) of Act No. 168/1999 on the Settlement of Labour Disputes – which requires that in case of strike in units of public transport one-third of the unit's normal activity must be ensured – so as to allow for the minimum services in this sector to be negotiated by the social partners concerned rather than set by the legislation; in the absence of agreement between the parties, minimum services should be determined by an independent body. The Committee requests the Government to indicate measures taken or contemplated in this regard.

The Committee trusts that the Government will be in a position to report progress soon on all the issues raised above in the framework of the law reform currently under way, and encourages the Government to continue to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

The Committee is also raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee takes note of the report of the technical assistance mission to Romania which took place in May 2008 in the context of the follow-up to the conclusions reached by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2007. It notes from the Government's report that pursuant to the ILO mission, the social partners that are representative at the national level in Romania, as well as representatives of the Romanian Government, signed a memorandum in which they agreed to improve the legal framework on labour and social dialogue and to request specialized ILO technical assistance on the legislative texts concerning: the right to freedom of association for trade unions and employers' organizations (Act No. 54/2003 which according to the Government, is currently under discussion before Parliament); collective agreements (Act No. 130/1996); and settlement of industrial disputes (Act No. 168/1999). A tripartite working group has been set up in order to examine amendments to the abovementioned Acts and focuses at present on a draft bill to amend Act No. 130/1996.

The Committee takes note of the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008 referring to acts of anti-union discrimination and employer refusal to bargain, as well as the Government's reply which focuses on the legislative framework for addressing these issues. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report statistical information on the number of cases of anti-union discrimination brought to the competent authorities, the average duration of proceedings and their outcome, as well as information on the activities of the mediation and conciliation services of the Ministry of Labour, Family and Equal Opportunities.

The Committee also notes the communications by the National Education Federation (FEN) dated 12 September 2007 and 27 May 2008, as well as the Government's reply of 4 December 2007 and 21 October and 11 November 2008 concerning collective bargaining in the public sector with regard to the wages of teachers. The Committee addresses this issue below.

Finally, the Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2611 and 2632 submitted, inter alia, by FEN, with regard to various aspects of collective bargaining in the public sector (351st Report, paragraphs 1241–1283).

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee requested information on the penalties against acts of interference which is prohibited under sections 221(2) and 235(3) of Act No. 53/2003 and Act No. 54/2003. The Committee notes from the Government's report that under Act No. 54/2003, the restriction of the exercise of the activities of trade union officials or the obstruction of the exercise of the right of freedom of association are punished with imprisonment from six months to two years or a fine between 2,000 Romanian New Lei (RON) and RON5,000. Noting that these remedies are provided under Act No. 54/2003, the Committee requests the Government to clarify whether they apply also to violations of Act No. 53/2003, and if not, requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to adopt dissuasive sanctions and rapid appeal procedures against acts of interference under Act No. 53/2003.

Articles 4 and 6. Collective bargaining with public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. In its previous comments, the Committee requested information on the process and scope of collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State under Act No. 188/1999 as amended by Act No. 251/2004. The Committee notes from the Government's report that under section 72 of Act No. 188/1999 the public authorities and institutions have the right to conclude agreements every year with the representative trade unions of public employees (or the representative of public employees where there are no unions) on the following subjects: the constitution and functioning of funds for the improvement of working conditions; safety and health at work; the daily work programme; vocational training; other measures concerning the protection of trade union officers. The Government adds that at present, the representatives of Government, and workers' and employers' organizations are holding tripartite negotiations for the establishment of a set of principles which will constitute the basis of a new law on the salaries of personnel in the public budget sector.

The Committee notes from the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2611 and 2632 that in the public budget sector which covers all public employees, including those who are not engaged in the administration of the State (e.g. teachers), the following subjects are excluded from the scope of collective bargaining: base salaries, pay increases, allowances, bonuses and other staff entitlements which are fixed by law. The Committee emphasizes that all public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State should enjoy the guarantees provided for in Article 4 of the Convention with regard to the promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated in the framework of the current labour law reform to amend section 12(1) of Act No. 130/1996 so that it no longer excludes from the scope of collective bargaining base salaries, pay increases, allowances, bonuses and other entitlements of public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee, in recognition of the fact that the special characteristics of the public service require some flexibility in the application of the principle of the autonomy of the partners to collective bargaining, recalls that the Government could adopt legislative provisions which allow Parliament or the competent budgetary authority to set upper and lower limits for wage negotiations or to establish an overall "budgetary package" within which the parties may negotiate monetary or standards-setting clauses (for example: reduction of working hours or other arrangements, varying wage increases according to levels of remuneration, fixing a timetable for readjustment provisions). Such measures should leave a significant role to collective bargaining and meet with the agreement of the parties concerned.

The Committee trusts that the Government will be in a position to report progress soon on the issues raised above in the framework of the law reform currently under way, and encourages the Government to continue to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

Russian Federation

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008 alleging assault on a trade union activist and numerous violations of the right to strike. It requests the Government to provide its observations thereon, as well as on the 2006 comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC), also concerning restrictions imposed on the right to strike and the alleged violation of trade union rights in practice.

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to:

- amend section 410 of the Labour Code, so as to repeal the obligation to indicate the duration of a strike, so as to allow trade unions to declare strikes of unlimited duration;
- amend section 412 of the Labour Code, so as to ensure that any disagreement concerning minimum services in organizations responsible for safety, health and life of people and vital interests of society, where the minimum services must be ensured during a strike, is settled by an independent body having the confidence of all parties to the dispute and not the executive body;
- amend section 413 of the Labour Code, so as to ensure that, when a strike is prohibited, any disagreement concerning a collective dispute is settled by an independent body and not by the Government;
- to ensure that workers of postal services, municipal services and railways can exercise the right to strike and, to that effect, amend section 9 of the 1994 Federal Postal Service Act, section 11(1(10)) of the 1998 Federal Municipal Services Act and section 26 of the 2003 Federal Rail Transport Act;
- to indicate whether there are any legislative restrictions imposed on the right to strike of civil servants other than civil servants exercising authority in the name of the State; and
- to specify the categories of workers employed in the internal affairs agencies prohibited from striking.

The Committee recalls that it had previously noted the Government's indication that the Ministry of Health and Social Development, together with the federal government authorities concerned and the social partners, had engaged in work to amend specific legislative acts so as to bring them into conformity with the recommendations of the ILO. The Committee notes from the Government's report that a working group involving most representative social partners was created to that effect in 2008.

The Committee hopes that the work of the abovementioned working group will result in the near future in a legislative reform that will take into account its previous comments and requests the Government to provide information on any further developments in this respect. The Committee reminds the Government that it can avail itself of the technical cooperation of the Office if it so wishes.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1956)

Comments of the ITUC. The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008 alleging acts of interference by employers in trade union internal affairs and their refusal to bargain collectively. It requests the Government to provide its observations thereon, as well as on the 2006 comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC) raising the same issues.

Articles 1, 2, 3 and 4 of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's report and regrets that it does not provide a reply either to the previous comments of the ICFTU or to the Committee's previous observation. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on all outstanding comments.

The Committee recalls that it had requested the Government to:

- specify the concrete sanctions imposed on employers found guilty of anti-union discrimination and to mention the relevant provisions;
- specify the sanctions imposed for acts of interference by workers' or employers' organizations or their agents in each other's affairs, particularly in the establishing, functioning and administration of the organizations, and to indicate the relevant legislative provisions;
- amend section 31 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that it is clear that it is only in the event where there are no trade unions at the workplace that an authorization to bargain collectively can be conferred to other representative bodies;
- take the necessary measures so as to ensure that the legislation provides for a possibility to conclude an agreement at the occupational or professional level;
- provide further information on the practical application of sections 402 and 403 of the Labour Code and 6(7) of the Law on collective labour disputes, which seem to impose compulsory arbitration in services which are neither essential in the strict sense of the term, nor involve civil servants exercising authority in the name of the State;
- provide examples of collective agreements applicable to civil servants and civil employees of the military service and the system of execution of penal sentences.

The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the Ministry of Health and Social Development, together with the social partners, had engaged in work to amend specific legislative acts so as to bring them into conformity with the recommendations of the ILO and that a working group involving most representative social partners was created to that effect in 2008.

The Committee hopes that the Government's next report will contain precise information on the above issues. It also hopes that the work of the abovementioned working group will result in the near future in legislative reform that will take into account its previous comments and requests the Government to indicate any further developments in this respect. The Committee reminds the Government that it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

Rwanda

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1988)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. The Committee also notes the comments of 29 August 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), referring to matters already raised by the Committee concerning the status of public servants and the exercise of the right to strike.

The Committee recalls that, for many years, its comments have referred to the following points.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations of their own choosing. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that: (1) articles 11, 33, 35, 36, 38 and 39 of the Constitution of 4 June 2003 guarantee freedom of expression and association for state employees as for all other citizens;

(2) Act No. 22/2002 of 9 July 2002 issuing the general conditions of service of the public service in Rwanda says nothing about the right of public servants to organize and to collective bargaining, but section 73 of the Act provides that public servants and the staff of public enterprises enjoy rights and freedoms on the same basis as other citizens; (3) the procedures for the implementation of section 73 of Act No. 22/2002 are still to be determined and that application of the provisions of Title VIII of the Labour Code governing occupational organizations should be extended to state officials; and (4) although the Government indicated that there are unions of public servants in Rwanda, the Committee held the view that the legal void as regards the right to organize of this category of workers could cause problems in practice. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that it was considering amending the Labour Code so as to provide in section 2(2) that "any person covered by the status of a public administration is not covered by the present Code, with the exception of matters decided upon by a decree from the Prime Minister", and that it was therefore anticipated that the Prime Minister's decree could extend the procedures concerning unionization, claims and collective bargaining to public servants. The Committee requests the Government to indicate without delay any progress made to ensure due recognition in the legislation of the guarantees provided for by the Convention in respect of public servants, in accordance with the requirements of the Convention.

Article 3. Right to strike. The Committee previously noted that, in accordance with section 191 of the Labour Code, the right to strike of workers in jobs that are essential to the security of persons and property, and workers in services the interruption of which would jeopardize human safety and life, is exercised in accordance with the specific procedures laid down by Order of the Minister of Labour. The Committee therefore asked the Government to provide a copy of the Order in question. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments concerning the adoption of the implementing decree for section 191 of the Labour Code or any other measures taken concerning this matter within the context of the revision of the Labour Code under way.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1988)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It takes note of the observations of 29 August 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it noted that the draft Labour Code, dated September 2006, omitted some of the comments it has been making for many years on the legislation of Rwanda.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that the national legislation does not make express provision for rapid appeal procedures, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference and anti-union discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to prohibit, in the draft Labour Code or some other legislative text, all acts of interference by employers' and workers' organizations in each other's affairs, and all acts of anti-union discrimination, and to make provision for sufficiently dissuasive sanctions to this end, not only in the case of staff delegates.

Article 4. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of a draft Ministerial Order on the establishment and running of the Conciliation Council issued pursuant to section 183 of the Labour Code. It reminded the Government that apart from the case of public officials exercising authority in the name of the State and essential services in the strict sense of the term, arbitration imposed by the authorities or at the request of only one party is as a rule contrary to the principle of voluntary negotiation of collective agreements established by the Convention, and hence to the autonomy of the bargaining partners (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 257). The Committee again asks the Government to amend section 183 of the Labour Code (section 222 of the draft Labour Code) so that, other than in the circumstances referred to above, a collective labour dispute in the context of collective bargaining may be submitted to the competent legal authority only with the agreement of both parties.

The Committee's earlier comments also referred to section 136 of the draft Labour Code, which provides that, at the request of one of the representative workers' or employers' organizations, the collective agreement shall be negotiated in a joint committee convened by the Minister of Labour. The Committee pointed out that such a provision was liable to restrict the principle of free and voluntary bargaining within the meaning of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to amend section 136 of the draft Labour Code so as to require the agreement of both parties for negotiation of the collective agreement in a joint committee.

The Committee also asks the Government to indicate whether the draft Ministerial Order issued pursuant to section 116 of the Labour Code to establish requirements for the deposit, registry and publication of collective agreements has been adopted. If so, please provide a copy of the text.

The Committee trusts that the Government will take all necessary steps to amend the draft Labour Code taking due account of the principles referred to above.

Article 6. The Committee notes that according to a communication of November 2006, the Government was planning to amend the Labour Code so as to provide, in section 2(2), that "anyone employed under regulations in a public department of Rwanda is not subject to the present law other than for matters determined by an order of the Prime Minister", and that it was planning thereafter for an order to be issued to extend to public servants the arrangements for establishing and joining unions, filing claims and collective bargaining. The Committee also notes that, according to the ITUC, the national legislation contains no specific provisions on the trade union rights of public servants. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged to establish by law (Labour Code or otherwise) the right to collective bargaining of public servants, covered by the Convention.

The Committee once again reminds the Government that it may call upon the Office for technical assistance with any or all of the issues raised in this observation.

Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the work of the National Labour Council in the area of collective bargaining, and on the number of collective agreements concluded and the sectors and number of workers covered.

Sao Tome and Principe

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes that no report has been received from the Government.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers without distinction to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee previously asked the Government to indicate whether public employees have the right to organize and to indicate the applicable provisions. In this respect, the Committee observes that section 9 of the Civil Service Regulations (Act No. 5/97) states that public officials and employees have the right to establish trade unions.

Article 3. Right of organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that it has been commenting for a number of years on the need for the Government to take steps to amend the provisions of Act No. 4/92, which refer to the following issues:

- the majority required for calling a strike is too high (section 4 of Act No. 4/92);
- with regard to minimum services, it is important, in the event of disagreement in determining such services, that the matter be settled by an independent body and not by the employer (section 10(4) of Act No. 4/92);
- the hiring of workers without consultation with the trade unions concerned to perform services essential to maintain the economic and financial viability of the enterprise should it be seriously threatened by a strike (section 9 of Act No. 4/92);
- compulsory arbitration for services which are not essential in the strict sense (services whose interruption might endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population) (postal, banking and loan services; section 11 of Act No. 4/92).

The Committee asks the Government to take steps to amend the abovementioned legislative provisions so as to bring the legislation into line with the Convention and to indicate, in its next report, any measures adopted in this respect.

Finally, the Committee also asks the Government to indicate whether federations and confederations are able to exercise the right to strike.

[The Government is asked to report in detail in 2009.]

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee had asked the Government to indicate what sanctions may be imposed against acts of discrimination which undermine freedom of association and acts of interference by employers and their organizations in workers' organizations and vice versa. The Committee notes the Government's indication that there is no appropriate legislation providing for sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee therefore asks the Government, once again, to take the necessary steps to adopt appropriate legislation which imposes sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference committed by employers against trade union organizations, in conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the Office in this respect.

The Committee is addressing a request on other points directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Senegal

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee previously requested the Government to send its reply to observations made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), which indicated that workers in the agricultural and informal sectors are not covered by the Labour Code, including in terms of trade union rights, and that striking workers in the mining and cement industries had been subject to reprisals. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the Labour Code applies to all workers in the private sector, including workers in agriculture and the informal sector. It also states that striking workers in the mining and cement industries were dismissed upon the authorization of the labour inspectorate, which conducted a thorough inquiry and concluded that the individuals concerned had taken part in an unlawful strike, sabotaged the main electrical substation and issued insults and threats with regard to their hierarchical superiors.

The Committee also notes the observations received from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in August 2008, the National Confederation of Workers of Senegal (CNTS) in September 2008 and the Free Workers Union of Senegal (UTLS) in September 2007, which refer to legislative matters already raised by the Committee. The comments also deal with intervention by the security forces during authorized protest marches and with discriminatory practices in the recognition of trade unions. The Committee requests the Government to send in its next report its observations on the comments above.

Article 2 of the Convention. Trade union rights of minors. The Committee has been emphasizing for a number of years that section L.11 of the Labour Code (as amended in 1997), which provides that minors over 16 years of age may join trade unions unless their membership is opposed by their father, mother or guardian, is not in conformity with Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government merely indicates in its report that the question of amending section L.11 is still under examination. The Committee trusts that the Government will take all necessary measures without delay to guarantee the right to organize of minors who have reached the legal minimum age for admission to employment (15 years, according to section L.145 of the Labour Code) as workers or apprentices, without the need for authorization from a parent or guardian being necessary.

Articles 2, 5 and 6. Right of workers to establish organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. The Committee reminds the Government that it has been commenting for a number of years on the need to repeal Act No. 76-28 of 6 April 1976 and amend section L.8 of the Labour Code (as amended in 1997) in order to guarantee workers and workers' organizations the right to establish organizations of their own choosing without prior authorization. After indicating in its report of 2006 that it was examining ways of amending the Labour Code and repealing any legislative or regulatory provisions contrary to the Convention as soon as possible, the Government merely indicates in its last report that the question is still under examination. Moreover, the Committee notes that, according to the CNTS, in practice some trade unions are recognized without having held a general assembly or congress while other trade unions constituted according to the regulations have been waiting years for their receipt to be issued. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Government will adopt measures without delay to repeal legislative provisions which restrict workers' freedom to form their own organizations, especially provisions directed at the morality and capacity of trade union leaders, or which grant the authorities a de facto discretionary power of prior approval, which is contrary to the Convention. The Committee trusts that the Government will provide information in its next report on any measures taken in this regard.

Article 3. Requisitioning in the event of a strike. The Committee recalls that its comments have been emphasizing for several years that section L.276 grants the administrative authorities, in the event of a strike, broad powers to requisition workers in private enterprises, as well as in public services and establishments who occupy posts considered to be essential for the security of persons and property, the maintenance of public order, the continuity of public services or the satisfaction of the country's essential needs. This provision states that the list of posts defined in this way shall be drawn up by decree. The Committee has recalled on many occasions that recourse to this type of measure should be limited exclusively to the maintenance of essential services in the strict sense of the term (those the interruption of which would endanger the life, safety or health of the whole or part of the population), to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or to acute national crises. The Committee also asked the Government to send a copy of the decree implementing section L.276 so that it can ensure that it is consistent with the provisions of the Convention. In its last report, the Government repeats that since the decree implementing section L.276 has not yet been adopted, it is Decree No. 72-017 of 11 January 1972 determining the list of posts, jobs and functions in which the occupants may be requisitioned which continues to be applied under section L.288 of the Labour Code. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary steps without delay to adopt the decree implementing section L.276 of the Labour Code and that the list of jobs determined by that decree will only authorize the requisitioning of workers in the event of a strike to ensure the operation of essential services in the strict sense of the term.

Occupation of workplaces in the event of a strike. The Committee noted in its previous comments that, under the terms of section L.276 in fine, workplaces or their immediate surroundings may not be occupied during a strike, otherwise the penalties established in sections L.275 and L.279 will apply. The Committee considered it preferable to include an explicit provision, in a law or regulation, establishing that the restrictions envisaged in section L.276 in fine only apply in the event that strikes are no longer peaceful. Noting the statement by the Government that it takes note of the comments above, the Committee trusts that the Government's next report will describe the steps taken to include a provision stating that the restrictions envisaged in section L.276 in fine only apply in the event that strikes are no longer peaceful or in cases where the freedom to work of non-strikers and the right of the enterprise management to enter the workplace are not respected.

Article 4. Dissolution by administrative authority. The Committee has been reminding the Government for several years of the need to amend the national legislation to protect trade union organizations against dissolution by administrative authority (Act No. 65-40 of 22 May 1965), in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee noted that section L.287 of the Labour Code did not explicitly repeal the 1965 provisions on administrative dissolution. The Committee notes the indication by the Government in its last report that Act No. 65-40 does not apply to trade unions, which can only be dissolved by statutory, voluntary or judicial means, but that the Government is continuing to examine ways of amending or supplementing the Labour Code to include an explicit provision in the national legislation stating that the dissolution of seditious associations provided for by Act No. 65-40 may on no account be applied to occupational trade union organizations. The Committee trusts that the Government will indicate in its next report the steps taken to amend the legislation in this respect.

The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the necessary steps will be taken without delay to give full effect to the provisions of the Convention and that the Government's next report will provide information on the progress made. It reminds the Government that it may request technical assistance from the Office in this regard.

Serbia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

In its previous comments, the Committee had taken note of comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2006 concerning alleged physical assaults against union delegates. The Committee notes that, according to the comments of the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions of Serbia (CATU) forwarded with the Government's report, this problem applies to educational as well as health care personnel. The CATU proposes, as a way to address this problem, to increase sanctions against possible attacks on workers employed in the education and health sectors. The Committee regrets that the Government has not communicated any observation with regard to these comments. The Committee recalls that the rights of workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations and it is for governments to ensure that this principle is respected. The Committee requests the Government to communicate its observations on the comments concerning physical assault against union officials and members.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of employers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee recalls that, for a number of years, it has been commenting on section 216 of the Labour Act which provides that employers' associations may be established by employers that employ no less than 5 per cent of the total number of employees in a certain branch, group, subgroup, line of business or territory of a certain territorial unit. The Committee notes with interest that the Government indicates in its report that it will take into consideration the Committee's comments on section 216 of the Labour Act in the course of amendment of the Labour Act. Considering that the 5 per cent requirement at all levels may hinder the establishment of employers' organizations, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to amend section 216 of the Labour Act so as to retain a reasonable minimum membership requirement for the establishment of employers' organizations.

The Committee is addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

The Committee takes note of the Law on the Peaceful Settlement of Labour Disputes of 2004.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination in law. The Committee takes note of the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2008, to the effect that although the Labour Law of 2005 prohibits discrimination on the basis of trade union membership, it does not expressly prohibit discrimination for trade union activities and establishes no specific sanctions for anti-union harassment. The Committee also notes that, according to the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions of Serbia (CATU), the right to organize is not protected in practice. The Committee notes, however, that the Labour Law prohibits all acts of anti-union discrimination and establishes dissuasive sanctions and remedies. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, including through statistical data on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination brought to the competent authorities (labour inspectorate and judicial bodies), the outcome of any investigations and judicial proceedings and their average duration.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee notes that, according to section 263 of the Labour Law, “[c]ollective agreements shall be concluded for a three-year term”. The Committee considers that the parties should be in a position to shorten this duration by mutual agreement, if they consider it appropriate. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to amend section 263 of the Labour Law in accordance with the above.

Representativeness of workers’ and employers’ organizations. In its previous observation, the Committee had raised the need to amend section 233 of the Labour Law – which imposes a time period of three years before an organization which previously failed to obtain recognition as most representative, or a new organization, may seek a new decision on the issue of representativeness. The Committee had emphasized the need to ensure that a new request may be made after a reasonable period has elapsed, sufficiently in advance of the expiration of the applicable collective agreement. The Committee recalls that the Serbian Association of Employers (SAE) had criticized this provision in its communication of 7 April 2005 as imposing an excessively long period of time. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that this provision is aimed at protecting unions and employers’ associations whose representativeness have been established by providing that their status may not be reviewed prior to the expiry of a three-year term. Nevertheless, according to the Government, this provision does not prevent trade unions and employers’ organizations, that previously failed to establish their representativeness, from asking for a new decision on this issue at any moment, without having to wait for three years. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to amend section 233 of the Labour Law in a manner which reduces the three-year time span to a more reasonable period or to allow explicitly the procedures for the determination of most representative status to take place in advance of the expiration of the applicable collective agreement.

The Committee takes note of the comments made by the CATU, forwarded with the Government’s report, according to which there is a lack of a mechanism for identification of the number of members of representative workers’ and employers’ organizations, as well as for verification of such data at the enterprise level. The Committee notes that, according to section 227, paragraphs 4 and 5, of the Labour Law, “[t]he total number of employees and employers on a territory of a certain territorial unit, in a branch, group, subgroup or a line of business shall be determined on the basis of information supplied by the competent statistical body, or other body keeping the pertinent records” and “[t]he total number of employees with an employer shall be determined according to the certificate issued by the employer”. The bodies in charge of assessing representativeness are the employer, in the first place, and the tripartite panel for establishing representativeness, in the second place. The Committee requests the Government to provide additional information on the mechanism for assessing representativeness of trade unions and associations of employers.

The Committee recalls that, in its previous observations, it had requested the Government to lift the 10 per cent requirement for employers’ organizations to be able to engage in collective bargaining which is particularly high, especially in the context of negotiations in large enterprises, at the sector or national level. The Committee notes that section 222 of the Labour Law of 2005 still requires employers’ associations to represent 10 per cent of the total number of employers and employ 15 per cent of the total number of employees in order to exercise collective bargaining rights. The Committee recalls that the SAE had criticized these provisions. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the issue will be considered when making changes and amendments to the Labour Act, with the participation of the representative workers’ and employers’ organizations. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged to amend section 222 of the Labour Law of 2005 so as to lower the percentage requirements which must be fulfilled by employers’ organizations in order to engage in collective bargaining.

The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures without delay in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the requirements of the Convention and requests the Government to indicate the progress made in this respect.

Seychelles

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee recalls that for several years, it has been commenting upon several provisions of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) concerning the issues of trade union registration and the exercise of the right to strike. The Committee notes that, according to the information provided in the Government’s report, there have been no changes in the legislation and that the IRA has not yet been revised. The Committee therefore once again requests the government to amend the following sections of the IRA:

- section 9(1)(b) and (f), which confers to the registrar discretionary power to refuse registration;
- section 52(1)(a)(iv), which provides that a strike has to be approved by two-thirds of union members present and voting at the meeting called for the purpose of considering the issue;
- section 52(4), which allows the Minister to declare a strike to be unlawful if he is of the opinion that its continuance would endanger, amongst other things, “public order or the national economy”;

- section 52(1)(b), which provides for a cooling-off period of 60 days before a strike may begin; and
- section 56(1), which imposes penalties of up to six months of imprisonment for organizing or participating in a strike declared unlawful on the basis of the IRA provisions, some of which, as mentioned above, are not in conformity with the principles of freedom of association.

In its previous observation, the Committee had noted that the Employment Department in the Ministry of Economic Planning and Employment had started to undertake consultations with social partners and other stakeholders on the issues raised by the Committee. The Committee had also noted the Government's desire to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this process. The Committee expresses the hope that the Industrial Relations Act will soon be amended, taking into account previous comments by the Committee and requests the Government to indicate any progress in this respect. The Committee trusts that the necessary technical assistance of the Office, requested by the Government, will be provided in the near future.

Sierra Leone

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Need to adopt specific provisions accompanied by sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions for the protection of workers and workers' organizations against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference. The Committee had previously noted that the revision of the labour laws, prepared with ILO technical assistance, had already been submitted to tripartite meetings, that the comments of the tripartite body had been received and that the document had just been forwarded to the Law Officers' Department. The Committee had asked the Government to keep it informed of any further progress made in the preparation of the final draft document and to provide a copy of the revised legislation as soon as it had been adopted. Noting that according to the information previously sent by the Government, the revision of the labour laws was submitted to the Law Officers' Department in 1995, the Committee requests the Government once again to make every effort to take the necessary action for the adoption of the new legislation in the very near future and to indicate the progress made in this regard.

Article 4. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the collective agreements in force in the education sector and in other sectors.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Slovakia

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1993)

In its previous comments, the Committee requested information on the system of extension of collective agreements pursuant to comments by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), alleging that bargaining rights were weakened by provisions which state that higher level collective agreements (covering a whole industry, sector or region) only apply to those employers who specifically agree to them in writing.

The Committee takes note of the Government's reply to these comments according to which section 7 of Act No. 2/1991 was amended so that employer consent is no longer required in order to be bound by the extension of a higher level collective agreement. The Committee takes note of the text of section 7 of Act No. 2/1991, as amended, communicated by the Government. The Committee notes that according to the Government, the employers' organizations lodged a request for review of section 7, as amended, by the Constitutional Court. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the decision of the Constitutional Court.

Spain

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been commenting on the Act respecting foreign nationals (Basic Act No. 8/2000 on the rights of foreign nationals in Spain and their social integration), which prohibits "irregular" foreign workers (those without proper work papers) from exercising the right to organize.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the Government's statement that, in Ruling No. 236/2007, the Constitutional Court declared unconstitutional section 11 of the Act respecting foreign nationals, which make the right of foreign nationals to organize or to join an occupational organization freely, under the same conditions as Spanish workers, subject to obtaining a permit to stay or reside in Spain.

Sri Lanka

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee notes the comments of the Ceylon Workers Congress in a communication of 8 July 2008, the comments submitted by Lanka Jathika Estate Workers' Union (LJEWU) in a communication of 11 July 2008, and the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication of 29 August 2008, concerning issues previously raised by the Committee. Furthermore, the ITUC refers to the arrest of strikers in the education sector and also indicates that several trade unionists were abducted and interrogated by the Government on suspicion of collaborating with insurgent groups. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC's comments.

Article 2 of the Convention. Exclusion of certain workers. In its previous comments, the Committee had trusted that the Government would take the necessary measures to ensure that judicial officers are guaranteed the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, both under the law and in practice. The Committee notes the Government's indication that judicial officers have their own associations and are satisfied with this arrangement, which grants them the right to deal with the Government, their ministries and their departments to resolve issues relating to conditions of employment. In respect of salaries, the Government further states that judicial officers and public service trade unions may make representations and submit claims for salary increases to the Salaries and Cadre Commission, which was established in 2005 to determine the salaries of public officers at all levels. The Committee notes this information.

Minimum age. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments, it had noted the discrepancy between the minimum age for admission to employment and the minimum age for trade union membership and had pointed out that the minimum age for trade union membership should be the same as the minimum age for admission to employment. The Committee notes the Government's statement that a proposal initiated by the ILO-IPEC Sri Lanka programme to increase the minimum age for employment to 16 years – the same minimum age as for trade union membership – is being pursued. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard.

Organizing in export processing zones (EPZs). In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee that trade union rights can be exercised in normal conditions in this sector. The Committee notes that according to the Government, organizations are not banned in EPZs and workers therein enjoy the right to organize and bargain collectively. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that 11 trade unions are currently operating in EPZs, and that 10 per cent of the workforce in that sector are union members.

Articles 2 and 5. Public servants. Previously, the Committee had requested to be informed of the progress made on the amendments to the Trade Unions Ordinance mentioned by the Government to ensure that organizations of Government staff officers may join confederations of their own choosing, including organizations of workers in the private sector, and that first-level organizations of public employees may cover more than one ministry or department in the public service. The Committee notes that, the Government reiterates that: (1) the matter has been given priority under the overall labour law reforms by the subcommittee appointed by the National Labour Advisory Council (NLAC); and (2) the National Plan of Action for Decent Work in Sri Lanka, which has already been presented to the Cabinet of Ministers, gives priority to the amendments to the Trade Union Ordinance. The Government further states that the Labour Law Reform Committee has since examined the proposed amendment and made recommendations to the NLAC; the matter is now under serious consideration by the Ministry of Public Administration and Home Affairs, and follow-up action is being taken by the Ministry of Labour Relations and Manpower. The Committee expresses the hope that the amendments to the Trade Unions Ordinance mentioned by the Government will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to indicate the progress made in this respect.

Article 3. Dispute settlement machinery in the public sector. In its previous comments the Committee had noted that the Industrial Disputes Act, which provides for conciliation, arbitration, industrial court and labour tribunal procedures, did not apply to the public service. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a mechanism for dispute prevention and settlement in the public sector was being developed by the Ministry of Labour Relations and Manpower and the Ministry of Public Administration and Home Affairs, and that technical assistance from the ILO had been sought in this regard. A draft document concerning the dispute settlement mechanism had also been drafted, but an English version of the said document was not yet available. Recalling that the prohibition of the right to strike in the public service should be limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, the Committee trusts that the public service dispute settlement mechanism referred to by the Government will be developed in conformity with this principle. It requests the Government to indicate the progress made in this respect, and to transmit a copy of the draft mechanism document once an English version is available.

Compulsory arbitration. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that it had expressed concern at the broad authority of the minister to refer disputes to compulsory arbitration and had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that workers' organizations can organize their programmes and activities without interference by the public authorities. Furthermore, it had noted that under section 4(1) of the Industrial Disputes Act, the minister may, if he or she is of the opinion that an industrial dispute is a minor dispute, refer it by an order in writing for settlement by arbitration to an arbitrator appointed by the minister or to a labour tribunal, notwithstanding that the parties to such dispute or their representatives do not consent to such reference, and under section 4(2), the minister may, by an order in writing, refer any industrial dispute to an industrial court for settlement. The Committee notes that the Government indicates, in this regard, that sections 4(1) and 4(2) were intended to provide safeguards against strikes that are likely to seriously affect the operation of the industry concerned, and hence production and productivity and, in consequence, the national economy. The Government adds that in practice, however, compulsory arbitration is seldom imposed without the consent of the trade union. While noting the Government's indications, the Committee recalls that provisions under which, at the request of one of the parties or at the discretion of the public authorities, disputes must be referred to a compulsory arbitration procedure, make it possible to prohibit virtually all strikes, or to end them quickly; such a prohibition seriously limits the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members, as well as their right to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes, and is not compatible with Article 3 of Convention No. 87 (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 153). In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to amend sections 4(1) and 4(2) of the Industrial Disputes Act, so as to ensure that any reference of labour disputes to compulsory arbitration may only occur: (1) at the request of both parties to the dispute; (2) in the case of essential services in the strict sense of the term; and (3) in the case of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee requests the Government to indicate all developments in this regard.

Article 4. Dissolution of organizations. The Committee had previously requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, in all cases where an administrative decision of dissolution of a trade union is appealed to the courts, the administrative decision will not take effect until the final decision is handed down. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this matter has been referred to the Labour Law Reform Committee for review. The Committee trusts that the Trade Unions Ordinance will soon be amended so as to ensure that administrative decisions of dissolution are suspended pending their appeal in court. It requests the Government to indicate any progress made in this respect.

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the Ceylon Bank Employees' Union and the Lanka Jathika Estate Workers' Union (LJEWU), in communications of 18 August 2008, and the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication of 29 August 2008.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee had previously noted that under section 43(1A) of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act of 1999, any contravention of the provisions concerning anti-union discrimination shall be punished by a fine not exceeding 20,000 rupees (LKR) and requested the Government to provide information on the dissuasive character of this provision, in particular by indicating the relationship of the amount of the fine to the average wage or other objective indicators. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the penalty amount of 20,000 rupees protects workers from unfair labour practices, and that there is no relationship of the amount of the fine to the average wage. The Government further states that a proposal has been initiated to revise and update penalties, surcharges and stamp duties under existing labour legislation. This matter has been referred to the National Labour Advisory Council (NLAC) in order to obtain the views of the social partners; although trade unions are free to express their opinions on the existing penalties to the NLAC, thus far none have yet to do so. The Committee notes this information. Further noting that the ITUC reiterates that the existing penalties are too low to provide sufficient deterrence, and that the LJEWU alleges the same, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that the views of the social partners are fully taken into consideration in the process of updating penalties under the existing labour laws. It requests the Government to indicate the progress made in this regard.

The Committee had previously noted the ITUC's indication that adequate protection against anti-union discrimination was not provided in practice, as only the Department of Labour could bring cases before the Magistrate's Court and there were no mandatory time limits within which complaints should be made to the Court. Subsequently, the Committee, recalling the importance of efficient and rapid proceedings to redress anti-union discrimination acts, had requested the Government to take measures in consultation with the social partners to guarantee a more expeditious and adequate procedure which, in particular, establishes short time periods for the examination of cases by the authorities. It also requested the Government to indicate whether trade unions had the capacity to bring their grievances concerning anti-union discrimination directly before the courts. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has provided no information concerning this matter. It once again requests the Government: (1) to take measures, in consultation with the social partners, to guarantee a more expeditious and adequate procedure which, in particular, establishes short time periods for the examination of cases by the authorities; and (2) to indicate whether trade unions had the capacity to bring anti-union discrimination claims directly before the courts.

Article 4. Measures to promote collective bargaining. The Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate the measures taken by the Social Dialogue and Workplace Cooperation Unit, as well as the measures taken under the auspices of the National Policy for Decent Work, to promote collective bargaining. The Committee notes that according to the Government, 29 Provincial Labour Advisory Councils (PLACs) were established in order to promote collective bargaining and tripartite consultations in a decentralized manner; their activities are coordinated by the Social Dialogue and Workplace Unit. As of July 2008, a total of 1,057 participants from 23 organizations had participated in awareness-raising programmes organized by the PLACs. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved by the measures taken by the Social Dialogue and Workplace Cooperation Unit and those taken in furtherance of the National Policy for Decent Work to promote collective bargaining, including information on the number of collective agreements concluded.

EPZs. The Committee recalls that it had previously commented upon the need to promote collective bargaining specifically within the export processing zone (EPZ) sector. From the information provided by the Government, it further notes that six new collective agreements had been concluded since the last reporting period. The Government also indicates that 11 trade unions are currently operating in EPZs, that 10 per cent of the total workforce in that sector belong to trade unions, and that 40 per cent of EPZ enterprises have employees' councils; the employees' councils have bargaining rights and a few of them are in the process of concluding collective agreements. While taking due note of this information, the Committee nevertheless notes that according to the ITUC, employees' councils are bodies funded by the employer without workers' contributions, thus giving them an advantage over trade unions, which require membership dues. The ITUC further alleges that employees' councils have been promoted by the Board of Investment (BOI) as a substitute for trade unions in EPZs. Recalling that Article 2 of the Convention establishes the total independence of workers' organizations from employers in organizing their activities, the Committee requests the Government to provide its observations with respect to the ITUC's comments concerning this matter. It further requests the Government to indicate the developments concerning the promotion of collective bargaining in the EPZ sector, including the number of collective agreements concluded by trade unions.

Provisions on trade union recognition. Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken so as to ensure that the recognition provisions for collective bargaining purposes were effectively implemented in practice. The Committee regrets that the Government provides no information in this regard. Noting the ITUC's comment that the recognition of unions for collective bargaining purposes is hampered by excessive delays, and that employers tend to delay the holding of union certification polls to identify, victimize and on occasion dismiss the union activists concerned, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that recognition provisions are effectively implemented in practice and to indicate any developments in this regard.

Representativeness requirements for collective bargaining. The Committee had previously noted that under section 32A(g) of the Industrial Disputes (Amendment) Act of 1999, no employer shall refuse to bargain with a trade union which has in its membership not less than 40 per cent of the workmen on whose behalf the trade union seeks to bargain. It subsequently requested the Government to ensure that if no trade union covers more than 40 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in this unit, at least on behalf of their own members, and to indicate the measures taken in this regard. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this matter was placed before the Labour Law Reform Committee appointed by the NLAC, and that in the ensuing deliberations the employer organizations did not favour a reduction in the 40 per cent requirement while the trade unions were not unanimous in their opinions. The Ministry, for its part, was of the view that reducing the percentage requirement might lead to inter-union rivalry. The Government further states that the matter had been raised by the trade union members at the NLAC meeting held in August 2008, and that no consensus had been reached with respect to the issue. The Committee further notes that the ITUC reiterates that, in practice, it has been difficult for trade unions to meet the 40 per cent requirement, partially as a result of tactics initiated by employers to frustrate such efforts. In these circumstances the Committee, once again recalling that if no union covers more than 40 per cent of the workers collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members, requests the Government to take the necessary measures to give effect to this principle and to indicate the progress made in this regard.

Article 6. Denial of the right to collective bargaining in the public service. Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to send its observations to the ITUC comment indicating that the right to collective bargaining is denied to public sector workers. In this respect, the Government indicates that in 2005 a National Salaries and Cadre Commission – comprising 15 members, of which 13 are independent persons and two are from national trade union centres – was appointed to restructure and determine salaries of public officers at all levels. Collective bargaining is provided for under the Commission's auspices, in so far as unions may make representations and submit claims to the Commission, and arbitration is also provided for by the Commission in areas where there are disagreements. The Government further indicates that the Commission, following the receipt of representations and claims from unions, then issues salary recommendations that are implemented subject to the approval of the Cabinet of Ministers. The recommendations made by the Commission in 2006 were approved by the Cabinet of Ministers and adopted and implemented; the trade unions had also accepted the recommendations of the Commission. While noting this information, the Committee considers that the procedures indicated by the Government do not provide for genuine collective bargaining, but rather establish a consultative mechanism – with perhaps some elements of arbitration – under which the demands of public service trade unions are considered, while the final decision on salary determination rests with the Cabinet of Ministers. In this regard, the Committee once again recalls that all public servants, with the sole possible exception of those engaged in the administration of the State, should possess the right to collective bargaining with respect to salaries and other conditions of employment. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the right of collective bargaining for public service workers, in accordance with this principle, and to indicate any developments in this regard.

Sudan

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication of 29 August 2008. The ITUC underscores that the legislation establishes a trade union monopoly controlled by the Government. The Committee recalls in this respect that such a trade union monopoly obstructs the exercise of the rights enshrined in the Convention. The ITUC also indicates that the export processing zone (EPZ) is exempt from the labour laws. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations regarding the ITUC's comments.

Violence against trade unionists and repression of trade union rights. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the Committee on Freedom of Association, in Case No. 1843, examined in March 1998, had referred to numerous arrests and detentions frequently followed by acts of torture against trade unionists, as well as acts of interference by the Government in trade union activities. In this respect, the Committee notes that the comments of the ITUC indicate that trade unionists have been the subject of harassment, intimidation, arbitrary arrest, detention and torture. The Committee deplors that, once again, the Government's report does not contain any information on these serious issues and recalls that trade union rights cannot be exercised in the absence of respect for human rights. The Committee further considers that the Government's silence represents a form of admission, in view of the observations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association in 1998. The Committee expresses its deep concern over the gravity of these allegations, particularly in view of the observations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee the personal safety of trade unionists and ensure respect for the rights enshrined in the Convention and to answer to the comments made by the ITUC.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it had observed on many occasions that section 16 of the Industrial Relations Act of 1976, and also section 112 of the Labour Code, allowed referral of a collective dispute or a collective labour dispute to compulsory arbitration and had requested the Government to take measures to amend the legislation so that arbitration may only be compulsory with the agreement of both parties, or in the case of essential services. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Industrial Relations Act has been annulled, and that a new Labour Code was being prepared that would take into account the Committee's comments on section 112 of the present Labour Code. The Government further states that it has sent a draft of the proposed code to the ILO Subregional Office in Cairo for its assistance in identifying the provisions that are in conflict with international labour standards. The Committee expresses the hope that the new Labour Code will ensure that compulsory arbitration may only be permitted with the agreement of both parties or in the case of essential services; it requests the Government to indicate the progress made with respect to the preparation of the new labour code, and to provide a copy of the said law upon its adoption. The Committee further requests the Government to transmit a copy of the instrument annulling the Industrial Relations Act of 1976.

Collective bargaining in practice. The Committee notes that the latest comments of the ITUC reiterate that collective bargaining is nearly non-existent in Sudan and that salaries are set by a government-appointed and controlled tripartite body. Regretting that, once again, the Government has not provided its observations thereon, the Committee again requests the Government to provide its observations respecting this matter. It also requests the Government to promote collective bargaining in the country and to send information on the application of the right of collective bargaining in practice, including the number of existing collective agreements as well as the sectors and workers covered thereunder.

The Committee once again stresses the gravity of these matters and expresses the hope that the Government will address all its attention to their resolution.

[The Government is requested to report in detail in 2009.]

Swaziland

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes the comments of 13 June and 14 August 2008 by the Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions (SFTU) and the comments of 29 August 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) which referred to issues under examination, as well as to dismissals of workers who engaged in lawful strike actions, to serious acts of violence and brutality from the security forces against trade union activities and union leaders in general, and in particular during a strike in the textile sector, to the imprisonment of an union leader and threats to him and his family, and to the refusal from the public authorities to recognize trade unions. The Committee trusts that the Government will provide a detailed reply to these comments.

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been referring to certain provisions of the law that are inconsistent with those of the Convention, or has requested information on the effect given to some provisions in practice. It asked the Government:

- to repeal the 1973 Decree/State of Emergency Proclamation and its implementing regulations, concerning trade union rights;
- to amend the 1963 Public Order Act so that it will not be used to repress lawful and peaceful strikes;
- to amend the legislation or enact other laws to ensure that prison staff and domestic workers (section 2 of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA)) have the right to organize in defence of their economic and social interests;
- to amend section 29(1)(i) of the IRA placing statutory restrictions on the nomination of candidates and eligibility for union office, to enable such matters to be dealt with in the statutes of the organizations concerned;
- to amend IRA section 86(4) to ensure that the Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration Commission (CMAC) does not supervise strike ballots unless the organizations so request in accordance with their own statutes;
- to recognize the right to strike in sanitary services (at present banned by IRA section 93(9)), and establish only a minimum service with the participation of workers and employers in the definition of such a service;
- to amend the legislation in order to shorten the compulsory dispute settlement procedures laid down in IRA sections 85 and 86, read in conjunction with sections 70 and 82;
- with regard to the civil liability of trade union leaders, to continue to provide information on any practical application of section 40 and, in particular, the charges that may be brought under IRA section 40(13); and
- to provide information on the effect given in practice to IRA section 97(1) (criminal liability of trade union leaders) and to ensure that penalties applying to strikers under section 88 are proportionate to the seriousness of the offence and that enforcement of section 87 does not impair the right to strike.

In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Government and the social partners signed an agreement undertaking to set up a Special Consultative Tripartite Subcommittee within the framework of the High-level Steering Committee on Social Dialogue. The terms of reference of the Subcommittee are: (1) to review the impact of the Constitution on the rights embodied in Convention No. 87; and (2) to make recommendations to the competent authorities to eliminate the discrepancies between the existing legislative provisions and the Convention. The Committee noted that the High-level Social Dialogue Committee decided, in respect of the constitutional issues, that the ongoing engagement between the Government and the National Constitutional Assembly, which extended beyond those groups in the Tripartite Subcommittee to involve other interest groups, should not be disturbed. Furthermore, the Committee noted, as regards legislative issues, that the Labour Advisory Board drafted an Industrial Relations (Amendment) Bill proposing amendments to the IRA in relation to sections 2, 29(1)(i), 85 and 86, taking into account comments made by the Committee (see above). The Committee nevertheless observed that some issues mentioned by the Committee were still not included in the draft or were pending consultation with the ILO (for example, the right to strike in sanitary services). The Committee notes from the Government's report that the special committee appointed by the Labour Advisory Board to draft a proposed amendment to the Industrial Relations Act of 2000 with a view to bringing it into conformity with the Convention has submitted its report to the Labour Advisory Board whereby it proposed amendments to the IRA and made recommendations with regard to the Decree/State of Emergency Proclamation of 1973 and the Public Order Act of 1963.

The Committee trusts that all its comments will be taken into account in amending the Industrial Relations (Amendment) Bill and that it will be adopted without delay. It requests the Government to indicate any development in this regard. The Committee recalls that the Government may continue to benefit from the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Furthermore, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps: (1) to abrogate the 1973 Decree/State of Emergency Proclamation and its implementing regulations concerning union rights; (2) to amend the 1963 Public Order Act so that it will not be used to repress lawful and peaceful strikes; and (3) to guarantee that prison staff have the right to organize in defence of their economic and social interests.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Confederation of Trade Union (ITUC), the Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions (SFTU) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC) which refer to issues already under examination, as well as to a number of acts of anti-union discrimination in the textile sector and in export processing zones, and to the denial of collective bargaining to prison staff. The Committee notes from the reply of the Government that the issue of anti-union discrimination in the textile sector is being addressed and a report will be submitted in due course. The Committee trusts that the Government will take all necessary steps to submit promptly a report in respect of all the comments from the ITUC and the SFTU.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it referred to the following points:

- the need to adopt specific provisions accompanied by sufficiently dissuasive sanctions for the protection of workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers or their organizations (Article 2 of the Convention); and
- the need to adopt a specific legislative provision so as to ensure that, if no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, this does not prevent the exercise of the collective bargaining rights of the unions in the unit at least on behalf of their own members (Article 4 of the Convention).

In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Labour Advisory Board (LAB), of a tripartite nature, reviewed the legislative issues raised by the Committee and drafted an Industrial Relations (Amendment) Bill which included a number of amendments to the Industrial Relations Act. The Bill referred to the need to tackle the issue of adopting a specific legislative provision so as to ensure that, if no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, this does not prevent the exercise of collective bargaining rights by the unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that the issue of the adoption of specific provisions, accompanied by sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, for the protection of workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers or their organizations, as required by Article 2 of the Convention, is being addressed. The Committee also notes the Government's intention to keep it informed of any developments in this regard.

While noting that the Government reiterates that the LAB has commissioned a special committee to draft amendments in line with the recommendations made by the ILO high-level mission and the independent judiciary inquiry after their visit, the Committee trusts that the Government will provide information in its next report on concrete legislative measures taken to address the issues at stake.

The Committee recalls the availability of the technical assistance of the Office in the framework of the legislative amendment process, and trusts that the legislation will be brought shortly into full conformity with the requirements of the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Switzerland

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in reply to its previous observation. It also notes the comments of the Union of Swiss Employers (UPS) and the Swiss Federation of Trade Unions (USS/SGB), communicated by the Government. The Committee further notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 29 August 2008 which largely refer to matters already raised and it requests the Government to provide its comments in reply.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union dismissals. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the comments of the USS according to which protection against anti-union dismissals was not adequate based on a number of court decisions on this matter. The Committee also noted the Government's reply, provided during the discussion in the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 95th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2006) and in its report, which on the contrary emphasized the adequacy of protection against anti-union acts, including recourse to the courts. According to the Government, Swiss law provides adequate protection for trade union delegates and representatives, thereby fully complying with the Convention; the current system relating to unjustified termination of employment takes into account the fact that compensation, which may attain six months' wages, constitutes a sufficiently dissuasive measure in view of the fact that the great majority of Swiss enterprises are small and medium-sized enterprises; the Parliament did not wish to introduce into Swiss law respecting contracts of employment the principle of the reinstatement of dismissed workers, which is not required by the Convention; the principles referred to were established democratically and confirmed by recent parliamentary interventions, and the question does not arise of proposing a legislative amendment establishing additional protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, as it would be doomed in advance to failure; the courts take into account all objective, and even subjective circumstances in granting compensation to workers, the amount of which is determined equitably; cases are the subject of regular legal action before the courts and the rights of the parties are respected, even in cases in which the parties have agreed upon arrangements on the basis of legal texts; and only five of the 11 cases raised by the USS in its complaint of 2003 may be considered as valid. The Committee also noted the indication that the Federal Council provided detailed explanations of the tripartite negotiations held following the adoption in November 2004 of the interim conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2265. The Tripartite Federal Commission for ILO Affairs examined the case. However, in the absence of agreement, it was not considered necessary for measures to be adopted to strengthen protection against unjustified dismissals on anti-trade union grounds or to make it more effective in practice. Nevertheless, according to the Government, the discussion on strengthening protection against unjustified dismissals may be pursued in a broader political and democratic context at the national level and parliamentary and democratic channels exist to ensure a serene political debate at the national level. The Committee noted that, according to the USS, proposals concerning protection against anti-union dismissals were discussed in November 2005, but were not retained. Moreover, according to the USS, anti-union practices and dismissals still occurred and judicial practice did not correspond to the criteria for protection against acts of anti-union discrimination set out by the Committee in its 1994 General Survey.

The Committee referred to the recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association during its examination of Case No. 2265 in November 2006 (see the 343rd Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, paragraph 1148) and requested the Government to keep it informed of any development towards greater protection against anti-union dismissals, and any development in case law respecting the compensation granted for unjustified dismissal for anti-union reasons, including by cantonal courts.

The Committee notes the Government's brief response in which it confines itself to expressing once again its deep concern at the fact that the Committee is applying to the Convention the principles drawn from interim conclusions of a case that is under examination by the Committee on Freedom of Association and which is more restricted in scope. The Committee notes that the UPS in its communication indicates its approval of the Government's observation. The Committee recalls that the methods of application of the Convention are very varied, but are only acceptable in so far as they are effective, and that its previous comments, rather than proposing a specific means of protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, pursued the objective of the effective application of Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's statement concerning the very limited number of cases of discrimination presented in 2003 by the USS. However, the Committee is of the view that, while the compensation applicable for unjustified dismissal (up to six months' wages) may have a dissuasive effect for small and medium-sized enterprises, this is less likely for high productivity and large enterprises. The Committee therefore requests the Government to relaunch tripartite dialogue in the light of its comments on the issue of adequate protection against anti-union dismissals. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate, where appropriate, any developments in case law concerning the compensation granted, and all other forms of reparation, in cases of unjustified dismissal for anti-union reasons, including by cantonal courts. The Committee hopes that the judicial authorities will take its comments into consideration.

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the observations of the USS concerning the establishment of staff associations partially financed by employers and the replacement of unions by staff committees. It also noted the Government's reply in which it recalled that legal procedures allowed the social partners to assert their rights and its indication that the courts could refer to a decision of December 2005 of the Collective Labour Relations Chamber of the Canton of Geneva concerning convictions for acts of interference and to order the holding of collective negotiations. The Committee requested the Government to indicate any development in case law, including at the cantonal level, on this matter. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the ruling of December 2005 by the Collective Labour Relations Chamber of the Canton of Geneva referred to well-established federal case law that is followed by the majority of jurisprudence. Accordingly, the scope of divergencies between cantonal courts is being reduced. According to this case law, which places limits on contractual freedom based on abuse of the rights and protection of the personality of trade unions, the employer may not refuse without a valid reason to negotiate with a trade union for the sole purpose of weakening the position of the workers. The Government adds that a union has the right to adhere to a collective labour agreement that has already been concluded, subject to its representative status. The Committee notes this information.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the observations of the USS concerning the inadequacy of the scope of collective bargaining in Switzerland and the absence of initiatives by the public authorities to encourage voluntary collective bargaining machinery within the meaning of the Convention. Noting the Government's reply, including the statistical data for 2003 concerning the collective agreements concluded in the country, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the manner in which the law and case law address abusive practices in relation to collective bargaining (substantiated acts of bad faith, unjustified delay in the holding of negotiations, failure to comply with agreements, etc.), and any measures adopted to promote the broader development and utilization of machinery for the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements. In its reply, the Government refers to the case law described above concerning the obligation to engage in collective bargaining, to which is added the principle set out in case law of the obligation to bargain in good faith. The Government adds that the lawful nature of strikes targeting the conclusion of a collective labour agreement is an additional means of pressure available to trade unions. The Government also refers to the existing procedures for the settlement of disputes at the cantonal and federal levels. Finally, the Government provides the official statistic that 611 collective labour agreements were in force covering 1,520,200 employed persons as of 1 May 2005, and it indicates that the coverage rate of collective agreements, according to a study, is 48 per cent and should tend to increase in future years. The Committee notes these indications and requests the Government to provide copies of the court rulings to which it refers, and any other relevant ruling relating to abusive practices in respect of collective bargaining.

Syrian Arab Republic

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2008, on issues previously raised by the Committee.

Article 2 of the Convention. Trade union monopoly. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend the legislative provisions which establish a regime of trade union monopoly (sections 3, 4, 5 and 7 of Legislative Decree No. 84; sections 4, 6, 8, 13, 14 and 15 of Legislative Decree No. 3, amending Legislative Decree No. 84; section 2 of Legislative Decree No. 250 of 1969; and sections 26–31 of Act No. 21 of 1974). The Committee takes note of the Government's reply indicating that the current law on the unity of trade union organizations has not been imposed on workers in any manner but rather reflects their choice, expressed through trade union congresses at various levels, in line with the Convention. Furthermore, the Trade Union Organization Act, like all the relevant laws and regulations, are being discussed within a tripartite structure before its adoption. Workers consider this issue as a red line which cannot be crossed and they are adamant on the clear expression of that choice, as provided for in the Convention. The Committee notes that the above is corroborated by the comments of the General Federation of Trade Unions (GFTU) forwarded by the ITUC, according to which the reason for the existence of a single trade union system is that workers themselves reject union diversity because it harms their interests.

While taking due note of the above information, the Committee must once again note that although it is generally to the advantage of workers and employers to avoid proliferation of competing organizations, trade union unity, directly or indirectly, imposed by law runs counter to the standards expressly laid down in the Convention. Although it was clearly not the purpose of the Convention to make trade union diversity an obligation, it does at the very least require this diversity to remain possible in all cases (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 91). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to repeal or amend the legislative provisions which establish a regime of trade union monopoly in a manner which allows trade union diversity to remain possible in all cases (sections 3, 4, 5 and 7 of Legislative Decree No. 84; sections 4, 6, 8, 13, 14 and 15 of Legislative Decree No. 3, amending Legislative Decree No. 84; section 2 of Legislative Decree No. 250 of 1969; and sections 26–31 of Act No. 21 of 1974).

Article 3. Financial administration of organizations. The Committee's previous comments concerned legislative provisions which authorize the Minister to set the conditions and procedures for the investment of trade union funds in the financial services and industrial sectors (section 18(a) of Legislative Decree No. 84, as amended by section 4(5) of Legislative Decree No. 30 of 1982). The Committee recalls that according to the text of Legislative Decree No. 84, as amended, a trade union can invest its funds in financial services and industrial sectors under conditions specified by Ministerial Decree after their approval by the Bureau of the GFTU. The Committee recalls that, in previous reports, the Government had indicated that the signature of the Minister is required merely as an administrative formality. It notes that according to the Government's latest report, the text of the law is not enforced in practice; the investment projects of trade unions are managed by the unions themselves through tenders and procedures carried out without any interference by any body including the Ministry; the Government attaches as examples documents showing that the investment of trade union funds in a hotel was carried out through private agreements and tenders. While taking due note of the information provided by the Government, the Committee considers that national law should be brought into line with the Convention and with what appears to be national practice. It also recalls that despite several legislative amendments introduced in 2000 to guarantee the freedom of trade unions to organize their administration and activities without interference, the provision in question was not amended. The Committee, therefore, requests the Government to indicate in its next report the steps taken or contemplated to amend section 18(a) of Legislative Decree No. 84, as amended by section 4(5) of Legislative Decree No. 30 of 1982, so as to lift the power of the Minister to set the conditions and procedures for the investment of trade union funds in financial services and industrial sectors.

Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend the legislative provisions which determine the composition of the GFTU Congress and its presiding officers (section 1(4) of Act No. 29 of 1986, amending Legislative Decree No. 84). The Committee notes from the Government's report that Legislative Decree No. 84 and the amendments made thereto have not been imposed on the workers and are the result of the struggle of the working class in the Syrian Arab Republic. The Committee recalls that it should be up to trade union constitutions and rules to establish the composition and presiding officers of trade union congresses; national legislation should only lay down formal requirements in this respect; any legislative provisions going beyond such formal requirements constitute interference contrary to Article 3 of the Convention (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 109 and 111). The Committee, therefore, once again requests the Government to provide specific information on the measures taken or contemplated to repeal or amend section 1(4) of Act No. 29 of 1986, amending Legislative Decree No. 84, which determines the composition of the GFTU Congress and its presiding officers.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate the provisions which explicitly amend section 44(B)(3) of Legislative Decree No. 84 so as to allow a certain percentage of trade union officers to be non-Arab. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, Legislative Decree No. 25 of 2000 amending Legislative Decree No. 84 of 1968 explicitly provides for the right of non-Syrian workers to join occupational trade unions; the law does not set down any discriminatory restrictions or provisions on the possibility of election of workers as trade union officers, regardless of their nationality. In this regard, the Committee once again observes that there are no provisions unequivocally amending section 44(B)(3) of Legislative Decree No. 84, which explicitly sets Arab nationality as a condition of eligibility for trade union office. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken to explicitly and unequivocally amend section 44(B)(3) of Legislative Decree No. 84 so as to allow a certain percentage of trade union officers to be non-Arab.

Right to strike. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend legislative provisions which restrict the right to strike by imposing heavy sanctions including imprisonment (sections 330, 332, 333 and 334 of Legislative Decree No. 148 of 1949, issuing the Penal Code). The Government indicates in this respect that the draft amendment of the General Penal Code contains provisions on this issue but has not yet been promulgated; a copy will be sent as soon as it is promulgated. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the progress made with regard to the adoption of draft amendments to provisions which restrict the right to strike by imposing heavy sanctions including imprisonment (sections 330, 332, 333 and 334 of Legislative Decree No. 148 of 1949, issuing the Penal Code) and to communicate the relevant text as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee finally notes that the Government does not provide any information in reply to the Committee's previous request for measures to amend legislative provisions which impose forced labour on anyone causing prejudice to the general production plan decreed by the authorities, by acting in a manner contrary to the plan (section 19 of Legislative Decree No. 37 of 1966, concerning the Code on economic penalties). The Committee notes that, in previous reports, the Government had indicated that the penalty of forced labour had been repealed by virtue of Act No. 34 of 2000. However, the Committee had noted that Act No. 34 of 2000 concerned amendments to the Agricultural Relations Act of 1958 and did not appear to repeal any penalty of forced labour. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the provisions which have been adopted or are being contemplated in order to repeal section 19 of Legislative Decree No. 37 of 1966, concerning the Code on economic penalties which imposes forced labour on anyone causing prejudice to the general production plan.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the Government indicates in its report that no collective agreement has been concluded in the last three years since none of the social partners has expressed the need for it. The Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the terms of Article 4 of the Convention, which states that measures appropriate to national conditions shall be taken, where necessary, to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organizations and workers' organizations, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements. The Committee urges the Government to indicate in its next report the measures to promote collective bargaining adopted by the national authorities in both the public and private sectors. The Committee reminds the Government of the possibility of requesting technical assistance from the Office in this respect.

The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1991)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary steps to amend sections 212, 213 and 219 of the Labour Relations Law (2005) so as to:

- lower the 33 per cent representation requirement imposed on trade unions and employers (or their organizations) for collective bargaining purposes at all levels;
- adopt legislative provisions regulating the procedure for determining the most representative organization, based on objective and pre-established criteria; and
- adopt legislative provisions regulating the procedure for establishing the negotiation board (the members of which are appointed by trade unions) when no trade union organization represents 33 per cent of employees or no employers' organization meets the same requirement.

The Government indicated that it intends to begin a "Twinning project" in October 2007 to review the existing labour legislation in order to harmonize it with the EU legislation. In the framework of this project, the issue of representativeness will be examined. The duration of the project will be 15 months; therefore, the Government expected that the necessary changes will be introduced into the legislation by the end of 2008. The Committee trusts that all its comments will be taken into account in the process of legislative revision and requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Togo

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. The Committee takes note of observations made on 29 August 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which refer to matters already raised by the Committee, as well as to the intervention of law enforcement services to prevent a trade union demonstration. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Furthermore, the Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 2006-010 of 13 December 2006 issuing the Labour Code.

Article 2 of the Convention. Export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee recalls that it has been asking the Government for several years to recognize the trade union rights of workers in EPZs. It requests the Government to indicate whether this category of worker benefits from the guarantees provided by the Convention under the new Labour Code. Furthermore, it requests the Government once again to provide information on any trade union organization that has requested the legal capacity to defend workers in EPZs.

Article 3. Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the right of foreign workers to hold trade union offices. The Committee notes with interest that under section 11 of the new Labour Code, migrant workers regularly established in the country and enjoying their civic rights, may be entrusted with the administration and management of a trade union.

The Committee raises other questions in a direct request to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received for the third consecutive year.

The Committee notes the observations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2006 and 2008, according to which the right to collective bargaining is confined to a single agreement that has to be negotiated at the national level and needs to obtain the approval of Government representatives, as well as of trade unions and employers. The ITUC further indicates that workers in export processing zones do not benefit from the same protection against anti-union discrimination as other workers. The Committee requests the Government to reply to the ITUC's observations in its next report.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Trinidad and Tobago

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the comments from the Employers' Consultative Association of Trinidad and Tobago (ECA). It further notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008, which are currently being translated.

The Committee has been referring for a number of years to the need to amend various sections of the Industrial Relations Act, as amended, so as to: (1) enable a simple majority of the workers in a bargaining unit (excluding those workers not taking part in the vote) to call a strike (section 59(4)(a)); (2) ensure that any recourse to the courts by the Ministry of Labour, or by one party only, to end a strike is limited to cases of strikes in essential services in the strict sense of the term (sections 61 and 65); (3) ensure that prohibition of industrial action in essential services is limited to cases of strikes in essential services in the strict sense of the term (section 67); and (4) repeal the prohibition of industrial action, under penalty of 18 months' imprisonment, for the teaching service and employees of the Central Bank (section 69).

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the Ministry of Labour and Small and Micro Enterprise Development has engaged in an exercise of strategic planning to achieve the goals of the country's "developmental plan, vision 2020" which recognizes that decent work is central for the social and economic development of the country. In this regard, matters related to freedom of association and the right of workers to organize are accorded high priority. Diverse mechanisms and measures to promote and protect the freedom of association and the right to organize have been adopted, in particular: (1) integration of labour issues in policies and programmes at national, sectoral, enterprise and industry levels; (2) review of labour legislation and (3) effective social dialogue with social partners. With respect to the amendment of the Industrial Relations Act, the Government further indicates that the Standing Tripartite Committee on Labour Matters, which consults and advises on proposed labour legislation, has not been reconstituted since its term expired in December 2006.

The Committee expresses the hope that concrete measures will be taken in the near future to amend the legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Committee expects the Government to communicate progress on these issues in its next report and recalls that it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee takes note of the comments from the Employers Consultative Association of Trinidad and Tobago, pointing out that the Committee's comments should be balanced in order to avoid problematic interpretation. The Committee also takes note of the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008, which are currently being translated.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee has been referring for a number of years to the need to amend section 24(3) of the Civil Service Act that affords a privileged position to already registered associations, without providing objective and pre-established criteria for determining the most representative association in the civil service. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the Civil Service Act review has been in progress but is not yet complete. However, after consultation with the employers' and workers' representative organizations, the Government considers that the amendment of section 24(3) is not possible at this time because the presence of more than one association representing the seven existing classes in the civil service for the purposes of consultations and negotiation could place the employer in a difficult position. The Committee recalls, however, that where there exists a trade union which enjoys preferential or exclusive bargaining rights, as in the current system, decisions concerning the most representative organization should be made by virtue of objective and pre-established criteria instead of simply giving priority to the one which was registered earlier in time, so as to avoid any opportunities for partiality or abuse. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the legislation will be modified in the near future, including section 24(3), so as to bring it into conformity with the principles of the Convention, and requests the Government to indicate any developments thereon.

Promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the need to amend section 34 of the Industrial Relations Act in order to ensure that, in cases in which no trade union represents the majority of workers, the minority unions can negotiate jointly a collective agreement applicable in the negotiating unit, or at least conclude a collective agreement on behalf of their own members. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the Standing Tripartite Committee on Labour Matters (a consultative body) has not been reconstituted after the expiration of its term in December 2006. The Committee expresses the hope that concrete measures will be taken in the near future to amend the legislation so as to allow minority unions in the unit to bargain collectively, at least on behalf of their own members when there is no union that represents the majority of the workers. The Committee trusts that the Government will communicate progress on these issues in its next report and recalls that it can avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office.

Tunisia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

In its previous observation, the Committee noted the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), dated 10 August 2006, which referred, inter alia, to the risk of prejudice to the right to strike, which had already been raised by the Committee, as well as cases of assault and violence against strikers, harassment and intimidation of members of the Tunisian Magistrates' Association (AMT) and the Union of Tunisian Journalists (SJT). The Committee further notes the comments, dated 29 August 2008, of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) relating to legislative matters already raised by the Committee and violations of the Convention in practice, including interference by the authorities to prevent trade union organizations from communicating concerning their activities, the closure of premises of Tunisian General Labour Union (UGTT) and the refusal to recognize a new trade union confederation. The Committee notes the Government's replies received in November 2006 and November 2008.

With regard to the observations concerning harassment and intimidation of members of the AMT and the SJT, the Government indicates that the founders of the SJT did not discharge the depository formalities required by the Labour Code for the establishment of the union and cannot therefore claim the legal existence of the union. In its reply of November 2008, the Government adds that the SJT has been reconstituted since September 2007 under the name of the National Union of Tunisian Journalists (SNJT), and that the latter now organizes its activities fully and freely, that it is finally autonomous and independent of the UGTT. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided information concerning the situation of the AMT. It recalls that the standards set out in the Convention apply to magistrates, who should be able to establish organizations of their own choosing to further and defend the interests of their members. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which it ensures that magistrates enjoy the guarantees afforded by the Convention.

With regard to the observations concerning the recognition of a union of university teaching staff, the Government indicates that it has always given priority to dialogue and adds that certain unions covering higher education personnel have encountered internal organizational problems, and refers in this respect to the establishment of a General Federation of Higher Education and Scientific Research (FGESRS), which was challenged in the courts by first-level unions, which in turn founded an independent union. The Committee further notes that, in its reply in November 2008, the Government denies any discrimination against teaching personnel on grounds of their trade union membership and activities. Finally, the Government indicates that the FGESRS has been constantly present in the delegation of the UGTT for the negotiation of its claims with the Government in 2007 and 2008. The Committee further notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee of Freedom of Association concerning a complaint presented by the above Federation (see Case No. 2592, 350th Report). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any development relating to the determination of the representativeness of trade union organizations in the higher education sector.

With regard to the refusal to recognize a new trade union confederation, namely the Tunisian General Confederation of Labour (CGTT), the Committee notes the Government's reply, in which it confines itself to recalling that the formalities of depositing the statutes of a trade union organization are carried out without the intervention of the Ministry of the Interior and accordingly rebuts the ITUC's comments. The Committee trusts that, insofar as the formalities required by the law are fulfilled, there will be a favourable and expeditious response to the request for the registration of the CGTT.

The Committee regrets to note that the Government has not provided any information concerning the observations made by the ICFTU in 2006 concerning cases of aggression against trade unionists and violence against strikers, or the ITUC's observations of 2008 concerning the closure of premises of the CGTT. In this respect, the Committee recalls that the rights of workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations, and it is for governments to ensure that this principle is respected.

Legislative changes. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been making comments concerning provisions of the Labour Code that are not in conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes in this respect that, in its brief report, the Government indicates that the possibility is being examined of bringing the provisions upon which the Committee has commented into conformity. The Committee recalls that these provisions relate to the following points.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. Section 242 of the Labour Code. The Committee recalls that the minimum age for joining a trade union should be the same as the age for admission to employment as determined in the Labour Code (16 years in accordance with section 53 of the Labour Code) and that there should be no requirement for authorization by parents or guardians. It requests the Government to amend section 242 of the Labour Code to that effect.

Article 3. Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom. Section 251 of the Labour Code. With regard to this provision, under which foreign nationals may have access to administrative or executive posts in a trade union provided that they have obtained the approval of the Secretary of State for Youth, Sport and Social Affairs, the Committee recalls that the imposition of such conditions on foreign nationals amounts to interference by the public authorities in the internal affairs of a trade union, which is inconsistent with Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to amend section 251 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that workers' organizations have the right to elect their representatives in full freedom, including from among foreign workers, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the country.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes in full freedom. (a) Section 376bis(2) of the Labour Code. The Committee has been recalling for many years that the requirement for a first-level union to obtain the approval of the central workers' confederation before declaring a strike, under the terms of section 376bis(2) of the Labour Code, is inconsistent with the Convention. The Committee emphasizes that a legislative provision which requires the prior approval of the trade union confederation for a strike is an impediment to the freedom of choice of first-level organizations to exercise the right to strike. Such a restriction could only be envisaged if it is included voluntarily in the statutes of the trade unions concerned, and not imposed by law. The Committee requests the Government to repeal subsection 2 of section 376bis of the Labour Code so as to guarantee that worker's organizations, irrespective of their level, can organize their activities in full freedom with a view to furthering and defending the interests of their members, in accordance with Article 3 of the Convention.

(b) Section 376ter of the Labour Code. With regard to this provision, which requires the strike notification to provide an indication of the duration of the strike, the Committee requests the Government to amend section 376ter of the Labour Code so as to remove any legal requirement to specify the duration of a strike and to guarantee that workers' organizations can call a strike of unlimited duration if they so wish.

(c) Section 381ter of the Labour Code. With regard to essential services, the list of which is determined by decree under the terms of section 381ter of the Labour Code, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the decree in question has been adopted and, if so, to provide the list of essential services as determined.

(d) Sections 387 and 388 of the Labour Code. In its previous observations, the Committee noted that: (a) the imposition of the penalties established by section 388 of the Labour Code, under which any person who has participated in an unlawful strike is liable to a sentence of imprisonment of from three to eight months and a fine of from 100 to 500 dinars, depends on the assessment by the criminal court of the gravity of the offences concerned; (b) under the terms of section 387 of the Labour Code, any strike called in breach of the provisions on conciliation and mediation, notice and mandatory approval by the central organization (this point relating to section 376bis of the Labour Code is also the subject of comments by the Committee) shall be deemed unlawful; and (c) section 53 of the Penal Code, under which the courts can impose a lesser penalty than the minimum established in section 388, or commute a prison sentence to a fine, fails to secure the proportionality of penalties. The Committee requests the Government to amend sections 387 and 388 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that the penalties envisaged for participation in an unlawful strike are proportional to the gravity of the offence.

Recalling that its comments have been made for many years, the Committee trusts that the Government's next report will indicate significant progress in bringing the Labour Code into conformity with the requirements of the Convention. It also recalls that the Government can request the Office's technical assistance on these matters.

Turkey

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee takes note of the report of the High Level ILO Mission which visited the country on 28–30 April 2008, pursuant to a request by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007.

The Committee notes the Government's report which contains, inter alia, a reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2008 (forwarding a communication by TURK-IS dated 12 August 2008). It also notes the Government's reply to the ITUC communication dated 28 August 2007 (Government communications dated 9 January, 28 March and 17 June 2008) and the communication of the Confederation of Public Employees Trade Unions (KESK) dated 31 August 2007 (Government communication dated 9 January 2008).

The Committee also notes the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 29 August 2008, the KESK in a communication dated 1 September 2008 and the Confederation of Progressive Trade Unions of Turkey (DISK) dated 2 September 2008. The Committee requests the Government to provide full observations on these comments.

Civil liberties. In its previous comments, the Committee, taking note of several communications by workers' organizations referring to violent repression of peaceful demonstrations, raised the issue of measures to give the police adequate instructions so as to ensure that police intervention is limited to cases where there is a genuine threat to public order and to avoid the danger of excessive violence in trying to control demonstrations. The Committee had noted in this context that according to Circular No. 2005/14 published on 2 June 2005 (Official Journal No. 25883), the representatives of public service trade unions and confederations at the province or district level, as well as the officers of trade union and confederation branches, will not face disciplinary proceedings by reason of press statements made in the exercise of their trade union activities outside the scope of their functions as public servants. Moreover, their activities (meetings and demonstrations) organized under the provisions of the Act on Meetings and Demonstrations No. 2911 will be facilitated. In addition, various other circulars of the Prime Minister order the administration to observe the relevant provisions of the legislation and not to obstruct union activities (circulars dated 6.6.2002, 12.6.2003 and 2.6.2005).

The Committee notes that TURK-IS, in a communication forwarded through ITUC, refers to the decision to prohibit workers from entering Taksim Square in Istanbul on May Day 2008, due to security reasons and to a violent repression of a peaceful demonstration by the TURK-IS affiliated Food, Beverage, Tobacco, Alcohol and Allied Workers' Union (TEKGIDA-IS) on 19 February 2008. The Committee also notes that KESK refers to disproportionate force used by police on May Day 2008 against the workers who had gathered in front of the DISK offices in order to take part in the abovementioned demonstration organized by the three major confederations, TURK-IS, DISK and KESK. The Committee notes moreover that the ITUC and KESK refer to several instances of restrictions of trade union activities, especially demonstrations and publications, including through prison sentences, judicial inquiries opened and proceedings instituted against trade union members and officials. With regard to the public sector in particular, the ITUC refers in its 2007 comments to interference in the activities of public sector trade unions by the Government as employer. In particular, according to the ITUC, in the course of 2006, 15 public employees were transferred, 402 were subjected to "disciplinary inquiries", four were given prison sentences, 131 were prosecuted in court and nine were fined; in 14 different workplaces, the unions were prevented from using their offices, and in three other cases, union offices were emptied by force during legitimate trade union activities. ITUC adds that unions must obtain official permission to organize meetings or rallies and must allow the police to attend their events and record the proceedings.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that trade unions are not above the law and should respect the provisions of the national legislation, in particular, the Act on Meetings and Demonstrations No. 2911 as every other natural or legal person. Unlawful activities of the trade unions totally disrespecting the provisions of the applicable legislation cannot claim protection against police interference. Furthermore, judicial means of recourse are available to the trade unions and their members to contest both the actions of the police and the constitutionality or compliance of the provisions of the national legislation with international human rights instruments to which Turkey is party and which prevail over the national legislation (article 90 of the Constitution). The Government also provides data according to which trade unions conducted 1,247 activities in the first five months of 2008 and all these activities, except two, were conducted lawfully and ended in general without any incident. In reply to the comments made by the ITUC in 2007, the Government indicates that out of 1,149 activities organized by KESK in 2006, 66 persons had been taken into custody as a result of five meetings; out of 722 activities in the course of 2007 and until October of that year, 12 persons had been taken into custody as a result of one meeting. The Government adds that all the cases of violent suppression of demonstrations and strikes by the police reported by the ITUC (including a protest organized by KESK on 30 May 2006 referred to in the Committee's previous comments) did not concern peaceful demonstrations and that the trade union leaders and members resisted and attacked the police, causing injuries; the police used force partly and gradually exercising the authority vested in it by the law. The Government finally indicates that unions do not have to obtain prior permission to organize meetings or rallies but rather, as provided in section 10 of Act No. 2911, should submit a notification signed by all the members of the organization committee to the provincial or district governor's office 48 hours before the meeting. The Committee requests the Government to respond to the comment by ITUC that trade unions must allow the police to attend their events.

The Committee recalls that trade union rights include the right to organize public demonstrations, especially to celebrate May Day, provided that the trade unions respect the measures taken by the authorities to ensure public order. At the same time, the authorities should strive to reach agreement with the organizers of a demonstration to enable it to be held without disturbances and should resort to the use of force only in situations where law and order is seriously threatened; the intervention of the forces of order should be in due proportion to the danger to law and order that they are attempting to control.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any proceedings instituted and decisions rendered in relation to the exercise of trade union activities, as well as any additional measures taken or contemplated with a view to ensuring that police intervention in demonstrations is limited to cases where there is a genuine threat to public order and avoiding the danger of excessive violence in trying to control demonstrations.

Draft bills. The Committee has been commenting for a number of years on draft bills to amend Act No. 2821 on trade unions and Act No. 2822 on collective labour agreements, strike and lockout. In its previous observation, while taking note of the improvements made to the draft bills amending Acts Nos 2821 and 2822, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate in its next report a specific timetable for the adoption and enactment of the draft bills amending these Acts in respect of the following issues: (i) the criteria for determining the branch of activity covering a worksite (unions must be constituted exclusively on a branch of activity basis); (ii) several detailed provisions in respect of the internal functioning of unions and their activities; (iii) severe restrictions of the right to strike (limitations on picketing; prohibitions and compulsory arbitration going beyond essential services in the strict sense of the term; excessively long waiting period before a strike can be called; heavy sanctions including imprisonment for participating in "unlawful strikes" the definition of which goes beyond what is acceptable under the Convention; prohibition of political strikes, general strikes and sympathy strikes).

The Committee notes from the Government's report that pursuant to the 2008 High-Level ILO Mission and as a result of several meetings held within the framework of the Tripartite Consultation Board and its Working Group, two draft bills amending Acts Nos 2821 and 2822 were amalgamated into one draft bill and submitted to the Parliament (Turkish Grand National Assembly) on 20 May 2008 by a group of Members of Parliament belonging to the Government Party. The Parliamentary Committee on Health, Family, Labour and Social Affairs reviewed and amended the draft text from 23 to 24 May 2008 with the active participation of the social partners and submitted the draft bill to the Turkish Grand National Assembly on 27 May 2008. The text of the bill will be duly communicated to the ILO when enacted into law.

The Government adds that legislative provisions that were reported on previous occasions as requiring prior constitutional changes – i.e., section 25 of Act No. 2822 prohibiting strikes for political purposes, general strikes and sympathy strikes as well as the prohibition of occupation of work premises, go-slow strikes and other forms of obstruction provided for in article 54 of the Constitution – were not included for amendment in the draft bill.

The Committee notes with interest from the report of the High-Level ILO Mission, that there was consensus among the social partners and the Government on some amendments to be made to Acts Nos 2821 and 2822 so as to respond to the comments of the ILO supervisory bodies. The Committee notes with interest that a Bill amending Acts Nos 2821 and 2822 was introduced in Parliament on 27 May 2008. The Committee also recalls that the Conference Committee emphasized in 2007 the need for rapid steps to bring the law and practice into harmony with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate progress made in relation to the enactment of the Bill amending Acts Nos 2821 and 2822 and to communicate the relevant text so that the Committee may examine its conformity with the Convention. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the bill in question will fully take into account the consensus noted by the High-Level ILO Mission, as well as the comments previously made by the Committee with a view to bringing national law and practice into conformity with the Convention.

With regard to the prohibition of political strikes, general strikes and sympathy strikes which according to the Government, are not included in the reform as they require a constitutional revision, the Committee once again recalls that trade unions should be able to stage action in support of social and economic matters affecting their members' interests, as well as sympathy strikes provided the initial strike they are supporting is itself lawful, and requests the Government to continue to indicate steps taken or contemplated to enable trade unions to take such action.

The Committee has been commenting for a number of years on a draft bill to amend Act No. 4688 on Public Employees' Trade Unions (as amended by Act No. 5198). The Committee notes that according to the Government, consultations were held with the social partners but no information is provided on a timetable for the adoption of this Bill. The Committee requests once again the Government to transmit a copy of the current text of the draft bill to amend Act No. 4688.

Furthermore, the Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been referring to the following.

The exclusion from the right to organize of a number of public employees including public employees under probation (section 3(a) of Act No. 4688), prison guards, civilian personnel in military installations, senior public employees, magistrates, etc. (section 15 of Act No. 4688) amounting, according to the previous and latest communication by KESK, to 500,000 public employees; furthermore, under section 6 of Act No. 4688, a public official must have been in employment for two years to become a founding member of a union. The Committee notes that according to the Government, it is envisaged to lift the prohibition of trade union membership for the civilian personnel of the Ministry of Defence and the police as well as the prison guards. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so that, in the framework of the legislative reform under way, all workers, without distinction whatsoever, with the only possible exception contained in Article 9 of the Convention, are guaranteed the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing.

The criteria under which the Ministry of Labour determines the branch of activity in the public sector and the implications of such determination on the workers' right to form and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee notes that according to the Government, the branches of activity determined in section 5 of Act No. 4688 are only 11 and therefore, they are not "narrow" and "leading to excessive fragmentation of trade unions in the public sector", as previously indicated by the Committee. This criticism, which is based on the complaint of Yapi Yol Sen [see the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2537 (347th Report, paragraphs 1–26)], stems from the closure of an administrative unit (General Directorate of Village Affairs) which belonged to the branch of "Public works, construction and village services" and transfer of its personnel to the local administration and therefore, the branch of "Local governments". Public servants exercise their right to organize according to the branch of service to which the public institution in which they work belongs and have the right to form or join organizations of their choice established in the relevant branch of service. Closure of an administrative unit within the framework of an administrative restructuring and transfer of its personnel to other units because of their status under public law rather than making them redundant, should not and cannot be considered as unilateral interference by the Government in trade union activities. Many trade unions have been established in the branches of services; for example 16 trade unions exist in the branch of education and the smallest number of trade unions in a branch is five.

The Committee takes due note of the Government's comments concerning the number of branches of activity and the reasons for the particular change in branch as a result of an administrative restructuring. It regrets, however, the consequences of this transfer for the free exercise of the right to organize of the public servants in question who automatically lost their membership in Yapi Yol Sen, leading the union to face financial difficulties, as well as the fact that trade union officers automatically lost their office. It notes that the difficulties in this case arise from the fact that one branch in particular concerns an administrative authority, i.e. "Local governments", while the other branches are thematic e.g. "Public works, construction and village services", "Education", etc.). Thus, the trade union membership was automatically lost, although the members continued to perform the same tasks under a different administrative authority. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide in its next report information on steps taken or contemplated so as to:

- (i) amend section 5 of Act No. 4688, as well as the Regulation on the Determination of Branch of Activity of Organizations and Agencies, which determine the branches of activity according to which public employees' trade unions may be established, so as to ensure that these branches are not restricted to any particular ministry, department or service, including local governments;
- (ii) amend the Regulation of 2 August 2005 (which amends the Regulation on the Determination of Branch of Activity of Organizations and Agencies) so as to maintain Yapi Yol Sen members within the branch of activity entitled "Public works, construction and village services" in conformity with the nature of their functions and their willingness to remain affiliated to Yapi Yol Sen; more generally, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures so that members of a union which may be affected by the modification of the list of branches of activity will have the right to be represented by the union of their choice in accordance with Article 2 of the Convention,
- (iii) amend section 16 of Act No. 4688 so as to ensure that trade union office is not terminated by reason of the transfer of a trade union leader to another branch of activity, or his/her dismissal or simply the fact that a trade union leader leaves the work.

Detailed provisions of Act No 4688 in respect of the internal functioning of unions and their activities. The Committee notes the comments made by the KESK and ITUC in their 2007 and 2008 communications with regard to repeated interference by the authorities into the statutes of the KESK and five of its affiliates (Egitim Sen, Kültür-Sanat Sen, ESM, Haber-Sen and SES) so as to make these trade unions amend their aims as stated in their statutes, with regard to terms such as “collective bargaining”, “collective agreement”, “job security”, “collective dispute” which are being considered as contrary to Act No. 4688; in 2006, Egitim Sen had to amend its statutes by eliminating reference to “the right to receive education in one’s mother tongue”, in order to avoid being dissolved.

The Committee notes that, according to the Government, internal rules of trade unions and confederations are a source of legal obligations and therefore, all the members are expected to abide by them. Thus, they are examined on the basis of the provisions of the Constitution, the Civil Code, the Associations Act, Acts Nos 2821 and 4688. The control is carried out after each general assembly and this makes it possible to observe the contradictions even if they had not been previously noticed. In case of divergences from the legal provisions, the workers’ organizations are requested to harmonize the provisions. Consequently, it would not be appropriate to interpret this type of control as pressure exercised on unions. Terms like “collective bargaining”, “strike” etc., are not criticized as long as these activities do not take place in practice. With regard to Egitim Sen in particular, the Government indicates that by reason of the statement in the statute of this union demanding education in one’s mother tongue, a criminal complaint was filed by the Chief Public Prosecutor’s Office claiming breach of articles 3 and 42 of the Constitution and a case for dissolution was filed in the Ankara Labour Court. In the decision of the said court dated 27 October 2005, it was found that this provision of the statute is contrary to the Constitution which provides that the Republic of Turkey is a unitary State and an indivisible entity with Turkish as its language and that no language other than Turkish shall be taught as the mother tongue to Turkish citizens at any institutions of training or education. Egitim-Sen amended its statute and the case against it was dropped. Trade unions should carry out their activities in loyalty to the Constitution.

The Committee recalls once again, that trade unions should have the right to include in their statutes the peaceful objectives that they consider necessary for the defence of the rights and interests of their members and that legislative provisions which go beyond formal requirements may hinder the establishment and development of organizations and constitute interference contrary to Article 3 of the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 110 and 111). The legislation may oblige unions to adopt provisions on various issues but should not dictate the contents of these provisions. Details could always be provided in guidelines attached to the Acts that the unions would nonetheless remain free to follow. With regard to the inclusion of terms like “collective bargaining” and “strike” in the statutes of public sector trade unions, which according to the Government are allowed as long as these activities do not take place in practice, the Committee recalls that the prohibition of strikes is only acceptable in the case of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and essential services in the strict sense of the term and that trade unions representing public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State should be able to engage in collective bargaining on behalf of their members, as one of the fundamental activities in which trade unions are involved. The Committee recalls that under Article 8 of the Convention, while trade unions are expected to respect the law of the land, this law should not be such as to impair the guarantees provided for in the Convention. With regard to the statute of Egitim Sen, the Committee recalls that in the conclusions and recommendations reached in Case No. 2366 (342nd Report, paragraphs 906–917) the Committee on Freedom of Association noted that on the one hand, limits may be placed on the right of trade unions to draw up their constitutions and rules in full freedom where the manner in which they are expressed may imminently jeopardize national security or the democratic order, and on the other hand, expressed serious concerns that references in a union’s by-laws to the right to education in a mother tongue had given and could give rise to the call for dissolution of a trade union.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated, including amending the detailed provisions of Act No. 4688, so as to allow trade unions in the public service to draft their rules without undue interference.

The removal of union executive bodies in case of non-respect of requirements set out in the law which should be left to the free determination of the organizations (section 10 of Act No. 4688). The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to amend section 10 of Act No. 4688 to enable workers’ organizations to determine freely whether union officials may remain in their post during their candidacy or election in local or general elections.

The right to strike in the public service. The Committee recalls that section 35 of Act No. 4688 makes no mention of the circumstances in which strike action may be exercised in the public service. It recalls that in the past, the Government indicated that a constitutional amendment is required for the review of restrictions on the right to strike of public servants; however, the Government is planning to launch a personnel reform in the public sector whereby “public servants” in the narrow sense of the term, i.e. those exercising authority in the name of the State, would be defined first and then carefully distinguished from other public employees. The Committee once again underlines that restrictions on the right to strike in the public service should be limited to public servants who are exercising authority in the name of the State and those working in essential services in the strict sense of the term and that in such cases, compensatory guarantees should be afforded to public servants, such as mediation and conciliation procedures or, in the event of deadlock, arbitration with sufficient guarantees of impartiality and rapidity (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 158, 159 and 164). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken, including the possible personnel reform in the public sector, so as to bring section 35 of Act No. 4688 into conformity with the above.

Associations Act. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, as provided in section 35 of the Associations Act No. 5253 of 4 November 2004, certain specific sections of this Act apply to trade unions, employers’ organizations as well as federations and confederations if there are no specific provisions in special laws concerning these organizations. Section 19 (which is applicable to workers' and employers' organizations), enables the Minister of Internal Affairs or the civil administration authority to examine the books and other documents of an organization, conduct an investigation and demand information at any time, with 24 hours notice.

The Committee notes that according to the Government, section 19 of the Associations Act applies only if there are no provisions in the relevant special law, i.e., Act No. 2821 on Trade Unions sections 47–51 of which concern the auditing of trade unions. Noting that section 19 of the Associations Act only applies in a subsidiary manner, the Committee recalls nevertheless, that the supervision of accounts should be limited to the obligation of submitting periodic financial reports or to cases where serious grounds exist for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to its rules or the law (which should be in conformity with the Convention), or if there is a need to investigate a complaint by a certain percentage of the members of the employers' or workers' organizations; both the substance and the procedure of such verifications should be subject to review by the competent judicial authority affording every guarantee of impartiality and objectivity (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 125).

The Committee recalls, moreover, that section 26 of the abovementioned Act (which is applicable to workers' and employers' organizations) establishes a requirement of permission by the civil administration authority in order for an organization to open student dormitories and boarding houses linked to education and teaching activities. The Committee notes that according to Article 3 of the Convention, workers' and employers' organizations have the right to organize their activities, such as, for instance, training, without interference which would restrict this right or impede its lawful exercise. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to amend sections 19, 26 and 35 of Act No. 5253 of 2004 so as to exclude workers' and employers' organizations from the scope of application of these provisions or ensure that: (i) verification of trade union accounts beyond the submission of periodic financial reports takes place only where there are serious grounds for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to its rules or the law (which should be in conformity with the Convention) or in order to investigate a complaint by a certain percentage of members; and (ii) activities of workers' and employers' organizations, such as the opening of training centres, is not subject to permission from the authorities.

The Committee invites the Government to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

The Committee is raising a number of other points in a direct request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes that an ILO high-level mission visited the country from 28 to 30 April 2008 pursuant to a request by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2007.

The Committee notes the Government's reports which contain, inter alia, replies to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in communications dated 10 August 2006 (government communication dated 2 January 2007) and 28 August 2007 (government communications dated 9 January, 28 March and 17 June 2008). It also notes the Government's reply to the communications by the Confederation of Public Employees Trade Unions (KESK) dated 2 September 2006 and 31 August 2007 (government communication dated 16 February 2007 and 9 January 2008); and by the Confederation of Progressive Trade Unions of Turkey (DISK) in communications dated 9 and 24 April 2007 (government communication of 16 October 2007).

The Committee also notes the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 29 August 2008, by KESK in a communication dated 1 September 2008 and by DISK in a communication dated 2 September 2008. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these comments.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted, in reply to information communicated by workers' organizations with regard to acts of anti-union discrimination against public employees who were trade union members or officials, various measures adopted in order to introduce dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination. Specifically, the new Turkish Penal Code No. 5237, which came into effect in June 2005, stipulates in section 118 that acts of force or threats to compel someone to join or not join a trade union or union activities, or to resign from a trade union or union office, shall be punished by imprisonment from six to 12 months and that obstruction of trade union activity through force, threats or other unlawful acts, shall be punished by imprisonment from one to three years. Section 135 stipulates that any person found guilty of unlawfully recording personal data, including trade union affiliates, shall be punished by imprisonment from six months to three years.

The Committee also recalls that with regard to the public sector, the Government had indicated that violations of section 18 of Act No. 4688 which prohibit acts of anti-union discrimination by any administrative officer will be punished with disciplinary measures in accordance with the legislation applicable to public personnel (Act No. 657). In its latest report, the Government adds that according to section 18(2) of Act No. 4688 a public employer cannot transfer a union representative or official without a valid reason and without indicating the reasons for the change clearly and precisely. Complaints regarding transfers communicated to the Ministry by trade unions are sent to the related institutions in order to evaluate the issue in accordance with section 18 of the Act and the Prime Ministerial circulars. Furthermore, according to section 18(3), a public employer cannot discriminate on the grounds of membership or non-membership of a trade union. In addition to this, section 18(a) of the Labour Act No. 4857 provides protection against unfair dismissals for trade union membership or participation in trade union activities outside working hours or, with the consent of the employer, within working hours.

While taking due note of these measures, the Committee also notes that the ITUC refers in its 2007 and 2008 comments to this widespread incidence of acts of anti-union discrimination in the public and private sectors, especially transfers of public employees who are trade union members or officers, interference in the activities of public sector trade unions by the Government as employer, and blacklisting and pressure to quit the union in the private sector.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the procedure that applies for the examination of complaints of anti-union discrimination in the public sector and to provide statistical data showing progress made in addressing effectively allegations of acts of anti-union discrimination and interference both in the public and private sectors (number of cases brought to the competent bodies, average duration of proceedings and remedies imposed). The Committee trusts that the Government will take all necessary measures to ensure that the provisions of the Convention in this regard are applied both in law and in practice.

Article 4. Free and voluntary collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been referring to the dual criteria applied in order to determine the representative status of a union for the purposes of collective bargaining. Under section 12 of Act No. 2822, in order to be allowed to negotiate a collective agreement, a trade union must represent 10 per cent of the workers in a branch and more than half of the employees in a workplace. The Committee had previously taken note of a draft Bill amending Act No. 2822 in order to address this point. The Committee notes from the Government's report that a Bill to amend Act No. 2822 includes amendments to abolish the 10 per cent threshold required at the sector level for a union to be recognized as a bargaining agent at the enterprise level. The said amendment, which is pending enactment in the Turkish Grand National Assembly, reads as follows:

A trade union affiliated to one of the confederations represented in the Economic and Social Council, active throughout the country in its branch of activity and organized in more than one workplace or establishment, or a trade union which is a member of a workers' confederation with at least 80,000 members, shall have the power to conclude a collective labour agreement covering the establishment(s) in question if its members account for more than half of the workers employed in the establishment, or each of the establishments, to be covered by the collective labour agreement.

If the trade unions meeting the abovementioned conditions represent more than half of the workers employed in a workplace or establishment in which they are organized, they shall have the power to conclude a collective labour agreement covering the workplace or establishment in question. In the case of enterprise collective labour agreements, the establishments shall be considered as one single unit in the calculation of the absolute majority.

The Committee notes that according to the Government, the social partners in Turkey are in general agreement on the basic parameters of the industrial relations system such as branch-level organizations and enterprise and workplace-level collective bargaining, which has been in place for two-and-a-half decades; the Government expresses the view that after the proposed amendments to the legislation, this system will continue functioning smoothly and in line with ILO standards.

The Committee notes that according to the 2007 comments by the DISK, the draft bill maintains the status quo and does not produce any solution to the problems relative to collective labour relations or make any contribution to the free exercise of trade union rights.

The Committee observes that the text communicated by the Government replaces the 10 per cent requirement found in section 12 of Act No. 2822, with a requirement of affiliation to a major confederation in order for a union to be able to engage in collective bargaining at the workplace level. The Committee notes, however, that this system appears to continue to restrict the level of representation and collective bargaining which should be determined through free and voluntary negotiations. Furthermore, the Committee also observes that the amendment maintains the requirement that unions should represent the majority of workers in a workplace (50 per cent plus one) in order to enter into negotiations with the employer with a view to the conclusion of a collective agreement. The Committee recalls that in such systems, if no single union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should be granted to the existing unions in the workplace, at least on behalf of their own members; however, this is prevented in this case by the requirement of affiliation to a major confederation. In particular, a representative enterprise union should be able to negotiate even if not affiliated to a confederation.

The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to review the draft bill and amend section 12 of Act No. 2822 so that where no union meets the 50 per cent membership criterion, the existing unions at the workplace or enterprise may bargain at least on behalf of their own members regardless of whether they are affiliated to a confederation or not. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the progress made in this regard, and so as to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary collective bargaining, in accordance with Article 4.

Collective bargaining in the public service. In its previous comments the Committee took note of information provided by the Government on the structure of collective negotiations in the public sector and raised certain issues concerning: (i) the need for additional information on the manner in which the direct employer participates in the negotiations alongside the financial authorities as part of the Public Employers Board which is the negotiating agent for the Government under section 3(h) of Act No. 4688; (ii) the need to amend section 28 of Act No. 4688 which limits the scope of negotiations to financial questions; (iii) the need for additional information on the manner in which section 34 of Act No. 4688 is applied in practice and the need to confirm that it is not applied in any way that gives the authorities, in particular the Council of Ministers, power to modify or reject collective agreements (section 34 of Act No. 4688 stipulates that, if an agreement is reached during the negotiation process, the agreed-upon text shall be submitted to the Council of Ministers for the appropriate administrative, executive and legal arrangements to be taken within three months, and the draft bills shall be submitted to the Turkish Grand National Assembly for enactment).

The Committee notes from the Government's report that: (i) the Public Employers' Board is composed of representatives of the Prime Minister, the Ministry of Finance, the Treasury, the State Personnel Presidency, as well as the public employers' organization; (ii) although section 28 of Act No. 4688 limits the collective negotiations to the financial rights of public employees, the subjects other than financial rights have been put on the agenda in four collective negotiations carried out since 2004 and Memoranda of Understanding (MoU) were signed on subjects other than financial rights in 2004, 2006 and 2007; in 2005, a MoU was signed on all the collective negotiation issues including financial rights; (iii) following the signature of MoUs, commissions composed of representatives of trade unions and public employers in equal numbers work for the realization of the subjects agreed upon; the union claims are reflected in the MoU either as claims accepted by the Public Employer Board or as claims to be taken into consideration or evaluated by the Public Employer Board; although the union claims are favourably received by the Public Employer Board, it has been considered that these claims should be dealt with through a draft bill concerning restructuring of the personnel regime in the public service which has been on the agenda for nearly five years and which will apply to around 2.5 million public employees; (iv) the State Personnel Presidency carries out preparatory work for draft bills on the implementation of the issues agreed upon, in contact with the authority concerned if the issue is under the scope of another authority; draft bills prepared as a result of the above are submitted to the Prime Minister's office; (v) the Tripartite Working Group in a meeting held on 28 December 2006 decided to amend Act No. 4688 in line with the observations of the Committee and work has been launched on this issue. The Ministry of Labour and Social Security has been working on this amendment and a draft bill to amend the preamble and sections 3(a) and 15 of Act No. 4688 have been communicated to the relevant institutions in order to receive their opinions. As a result of collective negotiations in 2007 between the Public Employers' Board and two of the negotiating agents, the parties reached an agreement on the continuation of work on several subjects, four of which are related to the amendments to be made to Act No. 4688. The Confederation of Public Employees of Turkey (Turkiye Kamu Sen) and the All Municipal and Public Services Workers' Trade Union (HAK-IS) attended the negotiations. Despite being a negotiating agent, the KESK did not attend.

Furthermore, in a direct request, the Committee had raised the need to amend section 34 of Act No. 4688 so that collective negotiations do not have to be concluded within a short time period of 15 days after which any disagreement is brought to the Reconciliation Committee. The Government indicates that although the time limit of 15 days is sufficient (as in general, five or six sessions have been held in the collective negotiations carried out so far and, if need be, the number of sessions can be increased), an amendment to extend this time limit to one month is under consideration in line with the demands of the social partners.

The Committee appreciates these developments.

The Committee notes the extensive comments made by the KESK and the ITUC on negotiations in the public sector. According to these comments, Act No. 4688 does not refer to the concept of collective bargaining but rather "collective consultative talks" restricted to financial issues; as a result, KESK has not attended the talks since 2007 in protest over the Government's refusal to hold negotiations instead of consultations, enabling it to decide matters unilaterally. The KESK adds that section 30 of Act No. 4688 (which limits the possibility to engage in negotiations to the unions affiliated to the confederation which has the most members in each sector of activity), violates the Convention because it restricts the freedom to determine the parties to collective bargaining. Finally, the KESK indicates that pressure has been exerted since 2005 on local authorities by the Ministry of the Interior not to implement the 130 or so collective agreements that the KESK affiliated All Municipalities' and Local Services' Employees' Union (TUM BEL SEN) had signed with municipal authorities during the previous 12 years; notwithstanding the fact that the European Court of Human Rights ruled in favour of the union on 21 November 2006, the Ministry has not changed this policy. More generally, it is reported that trade unions are not considered as social partners and the Government fails to consult them on major laws which affect workers' interests.

In this regard, the Committee takes note of the Government's reply according to which the "collective consultative talks" provided for in Act No. 4688 allow for negotiations on economic, social and individual rights and in case of disagreement, the Reconciliation Committee undertakes to resolve the disagreement. Representation on the basis of affiliation to a confederation with the most members in the sector of activity is in line with the principle of justice. With regard to the collective agreements signed by municipalities, the Government indicates that according to amended section 146(1) and (2) of Act No. 657, no wage can be paid to public employees and no benefit can be conferred on them other than those provided under the said Act. Collective agreements in the public sector are regulated by sections 3(h) and 29 Act No. 4688 and articles 28 and 53 of the Constitution. As public employees are not entitled to sign collective agreements, the agreements in question have been regarded as unlawful. In notification No. 158 of 6 January 2005, the Ministry of Finance indicated that the status of public employees depended on Acts Nos 657 and 4688, and it was impossible to act outside the scope of these Acts so as to enjoy rights which have not been accorded in line with these Acts. Consequently, the TUM BEL SEN trade union does not have the right to engage in collective bargaining.

The Committee takes note in this regard of the recently rendered final Judgement of the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights on the issue of collective agreements signed between TUM BEL SEN and municipalities (12 November 2008), in which it was found that:

“The right to bargain collectively with an employer had, in principle, become one of the essential elements of “the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of [one’s] interests” set forth in Article 11 of the [European Convention on Human Rights]. ... Like other workers, civil servants, except in very specific cases, should enjoy such rights, but without prejudice to the effects of any “lawful restrictions” that may have to be imposed on “members of the administration of the State”, a category to which the applicants in the present case did not, however, belong.”

In light of the above, the Committee once again emphasizes that all public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State should have the right to engage in free and voluntary collective bargaining, within time limits appropriate to allow for meaningful negotiations. Legislative provisions which give the financial authorities the right to participate in collective bargaining alongside the direct employer are compatible with the Convention, provided they leave a significant role to collective bargaining; tripartite discussions for the preparation, on a voluntary basis, of guidelines for collective bargaining could be taken into account as a particularly appropriate method to resolve the existing difficulties. The Committee also recalls that the right to join the organization of one’s own choosing includes the free determination of the level of representation (at the sector or institution level even in the absence of affiliation to a confederation). An additional issue to be overcome in order to allow for free and voluntary collective bargaining in the public sector is the recognition of the right to organize to a large number of categories of public employee not engaged in the administration of the State who are excluded from this right and, therefore, from the right to be represented in negotiations (this issue is addressed in a request sent directly to the Government under Convention No. 87).

The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated, including the public service reform, with a view to bringing Act No. 4688 and its application in line with the Convention on the following points: (i) the need for the direct employer to participate in genuine negotiations with trade unions representing public servants not engaged in the administration of the State and for a significant role to be left to collective bargaining between the parties; (ii) the need to guarantee clearly within the legislation that negotiations cover not only financial questions but also other conditions of employment; (iii) the need to clearly guarantee that the legislation does not give the authorities, in particular the Council of Ministers, the power to modify or reject collective agreements in the public sector; (iv) the need for the parties to be able to hold full and meaningful negotiations over a period of time longer than that currently provided for.

The Committee takes note of the Government’s indication concerning the forthcoming legislative amendment of Act No. 4688 and trusts that all the issues raised above will be taken into account within this framework. The Committee once again requests the Government to transmit the current text amending Act No. 4688 and to indicate in its next report the progress made and a specific timetable for the adoption of the amendments to Act No. 4688.

The Committee invites the Government to avail itself of further technical assistance by the Office, if it so wishes.

The Committee is raising a number of other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Uganda

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes with regret that, for the second consecutive time, the Government’s report has not been received. The Committee further notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008. The Committee had previously taken note of the Government’s efforts to encourage collective bargaining in various sectors, and had requested the Government to continue to pursue these measures and inform it of developments in this regard.

In this connection, the Committee notes with interest the ITUC’s indication that the recently amended legislation and efforts undertaken by the authorities have contributed to a significant improvement in respect of trade union rights, and that in most sectors employers that had traditionally been hostile towards trade unions have agreed to recognize and negotiate with them. The ITUC also reports positive developments in the textile industry, in particular, where, following an agreement between the Uganda Textile, Garment, Leather and Allied Workers Union (UTGLAWU) and a new textile employers’ association, three employers recently agreed to recognize and negotiate with the unions concerned. Further noting that the ITUC refers to the absence of collective bargaining in the public service sector, the Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon and to reply to the other matters raised in its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee notes that section 7 of the LUA sets forth the lawful purposes for which trade union federations may be established. The said purposes include, inter alia: the formulation of policy relating to the proper management of labour unions and the general welfare of employees; the planning and administration of workers’ education programmes; and consulting on all matters relating to labour union affairs. Noting that the lawful purposes delineated under section 7 of the LUA does not include collective bargaining, the Committee recalls that the right to collective bargaining should also be granted to federations and confederations of trade unions (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 249). In this connection, the Committee requests the Government to confirm whether the right of trade union federations to engage in collective bargaining is assured, in the LUA or in other legislation.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee notes that, under section 5(3) of the Labour Disputes (Arbitration and Settlement) Act of 2006, in cases where a labour dispute reported to a labour officer is not referred to the Industrial Court within eight weeks from the time the report is made, any of the parties or both the parties to the dispute may refer the dispute to the Industrial Court. Section 27 of the Act, the Committee further notes, empowers the minister to refer disputes to the Industrial Court where one or both parties to a dispute refuse to comply with the recommendations of the report issued by a board of inquiry. In this connection, the Committee recalls that recourse to compulsory arbitration is acceptable only for (1) workers in essential services, in the strict sense of the term; and (2) public employees engaged in the administration of the State. Otherwise, provisions that permit the authorities to impose compulsory arbitration, or allow one party unilaterally to submit a dispute to the authorities for arbitration, run counter to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements enshrined in Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to amend the above legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

Ukraine

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made in 2006 by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) on the issue of trade union registration, restrictions on the right to strike, interference in trade union activities and harassment of trade unionists. The Committee recalls that most of the ICFTU concerns were dealt with in Case No. 2388 before the Committee on Freedom of Association and notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association noted with interest the information provided by the Government on the outcome of investigations into the cases of alleged violations of trade union rights and considered that Case No. 2388 did not call for further examination (see 350th Report).

The Committee notes the communication dated 4 June 2008 received from the Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Ukraine (KSPU) submitting comments on the new draft Labour Code, which, in its opinion, would have a negative impact on the trade union activities and the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008 on instances of State interference in trade union affairs. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it had noted the contradiction between section 87 of the Civil Code (2003), according to which, an organization acquires its rights of legal personality from the moment of its registration, on the one hand, and section 16 of the Trade Unions Act, as amended in June 2003, providing that a trade union acquires the rights of a legal person from the moment of the approval of its statute and that a legalizing authority confirms the status of a trade union and no longer has a discretionary power to refuse to legalize a trade union, on the other. The Committee had therefore requested the Government to amend section 87 of the Civil Code so as to eliminate the contradiction within the national legislation and so as to fully guarantee the right of workers to establish their organizations without previous authorization. Regretting that no information has been provided by the Government in this respect, the Committee reiterates its previous request and asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Article 3. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their administration and activities. The Committee recalls that, for a number of years, it had been requesting the Government to repeal section 31 of the Law on employers' organizations, which provided that the bodies of the State authority shall exercise control over economic activities of employers' organizations and their associations. In this respect, it had noted that the draft amendments to the Law were being prepared and expressed the hope that the new amendments would take into account the Committee's request. The Committee regrets that no information has been provided by the Government, neither in respect of the measures taken to repeal section 31, nor in respect of the progress made in amending the Law. Recalling once again that the right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their administration without interference by the public authorities includes, in particular, autonomy and financial independence and the protection of the assets and property of these organizations (see 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 124), the Committee reiterates its request and asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to repeal section 31.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 19 of the Act on the procedure for the settlement of collective labour disputes, which provided that a decision to call a strike had to be supported by a majority of the workers or two-thirds of the delegates of a conference. The Committee regrets that the Government limits itself to providing the information it had provided previously (to the effect that the provision concerning the adoption of the decision by the majority of workers applies to enterprises where the number of workers is such as to allow for the possibility, in practice, of holding a workers' assembly; if, however, the enterprise employs a large number of workers, they shall elect delegates to a conference, in this case, the decision to declare a strike shall be taken by two-thirds of the delegates). The Committee once again recalls that if the national legislation requires a vote before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast and the majority is fixed at a reasonable level (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 170). It therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 19 of the Act on the procedure for the settlement of collective labour disputes accordingly and to indicate the progress achieved in this respect.

In its previous observations, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the practical application of article 293 of the Penal Code, according to which, organized group actions that seriously disturb public order, or significantly disrupt operations of public transport, any enterprise, institution or organization and active participation therein, are punishable by a fine of up to 50 minimum wages or imprisonment for a term of up to six months and, in particular, in respect of an industrial action. In view of the absence of the Government's reply, the Committee reiterates its request.

A request on another point is being addressed directly to the Government.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee had previously noted the comments submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) in its communication dated 10 August 2006 alleging cases of anti-union discrimination and interference in trade union internal affairs and insufficient protection against such acts, as well as the refusal of employers to bargain collectively with independent trade unions. The Committee notes that some of these matters were dealt with in Case No. 2388 by the Committee on Freedom of Association, which concluded that this case did not call for further examination (see 350th Report). The Committee notes the comments submitted by the Independent Trade Union of Miners (ITUM) of the coalmine named after MP Barakov, Kzasnodon on the application of the Convention in communications dated 24 March and 19 April 2008 and the Government's reply thereon. The Committee notes the comments submitted by the Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Ukraine (KSPU) in a communication dated 28 August 2008 and by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008, referring to the new cases of anti-union discrimination and interference, as well as violation of the right to bargain collectively in the public and private sectors. While noting the ITUC's statement that some of the incidents of trade union discrimination have been effectively addressed by the courts and that the Government has been making efforts to resolve the complaints reported to the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the comments submitted by the KSPU and the ITUC.

Article 4. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that the work on drafting the new Labour Code was still ongoing and the draft chapter on collective agreements had been sent for consideration to the Committee on social and labour issues of the Supreme Council of Ukraine. It requested the Government to indicate the developments regarding the adoption of the new Labour Code. The Committee notes from the Government's report that on 20 May 2008, the Supreme Council of Ukraine adopted in the first reading, the draft Labour Code submitted by the people's deputies. The Committee notes, in this respect, the KSPU's communication dated 4 June 2008 submitting comments on the draft Labour Code (the version adopted in the first reading), which, in its opinion, would have a negative impact on trade union activities. The Committee notes that the Office is providing technical assistance to the Government and trusts that the new Labour Code will be in full conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to indicate any developments in this respect.

United Kingdom

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1949)

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules without interference by the public authorities. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to ensure more fully the right of trade unions to draw up their rules and formulate their programmes without interference from the authorities, and in particular when they intend to exclude or expel individuals on account of membership in an extremist political party with principles and policies wholly repugnant to the trade union. The Committee welcomes the Judgement of the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) reached in the case of Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen (ASLEF) v. the United Kingdom (27 May 2007) which refers to Articles 3 and 5 of the Convention and which found that section 174 of the Trade Unions and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act, 1992 (TULRA) violated Article 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights on freedom of association in that it did not strike a proper balance between the rights of individual members and those of the trade union.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that pursuant to this decision, it acted with the necessary degree of urgency to amend the relevant provisions of the TULRA in consultation with the social partners. The Government made legislative proposals to the United Kingdom Parliament to amend section 174 and the related provisions concerning remedies in section 176; these proposals are currently contained in clause 19 of the Employment Bill, introduced in the House of Lords on 6 December 2007. The Bill completed its passage in the House of Lords and on 3 June 2008 was introduced into the House of Commons. The Government expects the Bill to gain Royal Assent in the autumn of 2008.

On the substance of the amendments, the Committee notes that according to the Government, clause 18 of the Employment Bill provides wider scope for trade unions to expel or exclude a person on grounds of political party membership, as well as safeguards aimed to ensure that exclusion or expulsion on these grounds is lawful only in cases where membership of the political party concerned is contrary to a rule or objective of the union and where the union has followed fair procedures when taking its decision to exclude or expel. With regard to Northern Ireland in particular, the Government indicates that public consultations were launched in June 2008 on proposals to amend similar provisions to TULRA (article 38 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Northern Ireland) Order, 1995). The consultation will run until 30 September 2008 and any legislative amendments will be taken forward in an Employment Bill through the Northern Ireland Assembly in 2009.

The Committee takes note of the detailed comments on the Government's report made by the Trades Union Congress (TUC) in a communication dated 1 September 2008, as well as the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008. The Committee notes that while the TUC welcomes the introduction of the Employment Bill into Parliament, it has reservations about the detail introduced in clause 18 which was heavily amended in the House of Lords. The TUC considers that if clause 18 is enacted in its present form, a trade union would be able lawfully to expel someone because of membership of a political party, only if this is in accordance with the rules or objectives of the union, but in the latter case, only if the objective is accessible to the individual in question; even if the decision is taken in accordance with the rules or objectives of the union, it would still be unlawful if certain procedural obligations were not complied with first, and if representations made by the individual were not considered fairly; the TUC believes that these provisions are unnecessary and disproportionate given that there is already protection at common law for those expelled from a trade union without authority under the rules, to which these amendments add another layer of regulation; the TUC adds that even if these substantive/procedural obligations were met, it would also be unlawful to exclude or expel if to do so would cause the individual to lose his or her livelihood or suffer "exceptional hardship"; this term is not defined and it is difficult to anticipate its meaning given that there is already statutory protection from discrimination or dismissal because of non-membership of a trade union. If the union does not comply with these rules it will be liable to pay a minimum award of compensation to the individual concerned (currently £6,900). Finally, the TUC contends that the new legislation's complexity is likely to lead to unjustified and vexatious litigation. It adds that section 174 of the TULRA should be repealed as a whole to reinstate unions' rights to freedom of association.

The Committee requests the Government to reply to the concerns expressed by the TUC, and to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the amendments to section 174 of the TULRA fully guarantee the right of unions to draw up their constitutions and rules without interference by the public authorities.

Immunities in respect of civil liability for strikes and other industrial action (sections 223 and 224 of the TULRA). The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to protect the right of workers to take industrial action in relation to matters which affect them even though, in certain cases, the direct employer may not be party to the dispute, and to participate in sympathy strikes provided the initial strike they are supporting is itself lawful. The Committee takes note of the Government's indication that it has no plans to change the law in this area as it considers it essential under its system of decentralized industrial relations that it should remain unlawful for a trade union to organize any form of secondary industrial action. The Committee notes that according to the TUC, the decentralized nature of the industrial relations system makes it more important for workers to be able to take action against employers who are easily able to undermine union action by complex corporate structures, by transferring work, or by hiving off companies. In this connection the Committee recalls once again that workers should be able to participate in sympathy strikes, provided the initial strike they are supporting is lawful, and to take industrial action in relation to social and economic matters which affect them, even though the direct employer may not be a party to the dispute, and requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures contemplated to amend sections 223 and 224 of the TULRA in keeping with this principle.

Reinstatement of workers having participated in lawful industrial action. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of the TUC's indication that the Employment Relations Act of 2004 (ERA) amends the TULRA (by adding subsection 7B to section 283A) so as to make it unlawful for an employer to dismiss an employee for taking part in a lawful strike for the first 12 weeks of the strike. The Committee notes from the Government's report that protection against dismissal for employees who break their contracts of employment in the framework of official and lawfully organized industrial action, is now greater than at any other time in the country's history pursuant to new protections introduced in the Employment Relations Acts 1999 and 2004 and the Employment Relations (Northern Ireland) Orders of 1999 and 2004. The new protections take two forms: first, it is unlawful to dismiss on the grounds of a person's participation in industrial action, where the action took place within a period of 12 weeks (covering the vast majority of official industrial action); second, a dismissal is unfair if the employer has failed to follow all reasonable procedural steps to resolve the dispute with the union; this condition applies to official and lawfully organized industrial action beyond the 12-week period. The Government adds that it does not support the view that the employer must never dismiss employees under any circumstances when they take industrial action.

The Committee notes, however, that in its latest comments, the TUC lists a number of defects in the protection for striking workers in the United Kingdom: (i) it remains a breach of contract at common law for workers to take part in strike action, and recent legislation simply gives some protection from the consequences of the common law position in certain circumstances instead of changing this position; (ii) trade union members are protected from the common law consequences (dismissal) only when the trade union has immunity from liability, i.e. when the strikes are in contemplation or furtherance of a “trade dispute” which, as previously indicated by the Committee of Experts, allows for industrial action in narrow circumstances (see above); (iii) even where the protection against dismissal does arise, it is not unlimited but applies only for the first 12 weeks of the dispute and any extension is conditional and not guaranteed; (iv) even where the protection applies and someone is unfairly dismissed, the unfairly dismissed employees have no right to return to work if the employer objects.

The Committee is of the view that for the right to strike to be effectively guaranteed, the workers who stage a lawful strike should be able to return to their posts after the end of the industrial action. Making the return to work conditional on time limits and on the employer’s consent constitute, in the Committee’s view, obstacles to the effective exercise of this right, which constitutes an essential means for workers to promote and defend the interests of their members. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated so as to amend the TULRA with a view to strengthening the protection available to workers who stage official and lawfully organized industrial action.

Notice requirements for industrial action. In its previous comments, the Committee had taken note of comments made by the TUC to the effect that the notice requirements for an industrial action to be protected by immunity were unjustifiably burdensome. The Committee notes that according to the Government, a number of measures have already been taken to simplify sections 226–235 of the TULRA and 104–109 of the 1995 Order; moreover, as part of a plan published in December 2006 to simplify aspects of employment law, the Government explicitly invited trade unions to come forward with their ideas to simplify trade union law further. Since then, the Government has held discussions with the TUC to examine their ideas to simplify aspects of the law on industrial action ballots and notices. These discussions are ongoing. The Committee notes that in its latest comments, the TUC notes that there has been no progress in this reform. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising additional points in a request directly addressed to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1950)

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination and interference especially in the context of the statutory recognition procedure. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Trades Union Congress’s (TUC) indication that protection against anti-union discrimination (unfair practices) only applies in the framework of the organization of a recognition ballot, whereas a lot of the misconduct by an employer may take place at a much earlier stage, where the union is trying to organize, recruit and build up some kind of structure. The TUC had expressed concern at the lack of protection in practice against unfair practices by employers taking place long before the balloting period, in order to discourage any organizing campaign by a union (including threats of closure of the plant and individual job loss, actual dismissals, pay and promotion inducements, holding a company ballot in advance of an independently conducted ballot, denial of any access to a union including preventing leaflets being given to the employees, holding anti-union meetings at the workplace, one-on-one meetings, changes to the bargaining unit – either splitting it or combining it with others). The TUC had also indicated that the statutory procedure for recognition allows an employer to prevent an application for recognition to be made by an independent trade union by setting up an in-house company union and voluntarily extending to it recognition rights; the TUC referred to the case of POA and Securicor Custodial Services Ltd., where the union was denied the right to recognition – even though it had the support of a majority of members in the unit – as the employer had concluded a recognition agreement with a staff association.

The Committee notes that according to the Government, individuals are protected from dismissal or other detriment in relation to their right to belong to a trade union, participate in the activities of the union at an appropriate time and make use of a union’s services (sections 146 and 152 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992 (TULRA), and articles 73 and 136 of the Employment Rights (Northern Ireland) Order 1996). These provisions were strengthened by the Employment Relations Act 2004 and the Employment Relations (Northern Ireland) Order 2004, which made it unlawful for an employer to offer inducements to workers not to belong to a trade union, not to participate in a union’s activities at an appropriate time and not to use a union’s services at an appropriate time (section 145A of TULRA and article 77A of the 1996 Order inserted by the 2004 Act/Order). The rights apply equally to situations where a union is recognized and where it is not recognized for collective bargaining purposes. The Government emphasizes that these rights provide adequate protection for trade unions in advance of making requests to employers for recognition. In addition to this, protection applies during the statutory recognition procedure (paragraphs 156 to 162 of Schedule A1 of TULRA/paragraphs 156–162 of Schedule 1A of the 1996 Order). However, according to the Government, given the existence of many trade unions in the United Kingdom, the statutory procedure has been designed to ensure that it is not used as a vehicle for counter-productive tendencies to rivalry. Thus, a union cannot have its application for recognition accepted and processed if its proposed bargaining unit overlaps in any way with the bargaining unit of a trade union which is already recognized. In situations where the incumbent trade union is non-independent, it may be derecognized through an application by the workers covered by the recognition arrangement. It is permissible for a non-incumbent trade union to assist the workers involved in making an application to derecognize the trade union.

The Committee notes that according to the latest communication by the TUC: (i) the law provides for protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, but only where this is the sole or main purpose of the employer; an act of anti-union discrimination is not unlawful where the employer's purpose is incidentally to discriminate on grounds of trade union membership (section 145A of TULRA requires the "sole or main purpose" of an employer's offer to be the inducement of the worker to give up trade union membership or participation in trade union activities; moreover, section 152 of TULRA provides that a dismissal shall be regarded as unfair where the reason for it – or, if more than one, the principal reason – is trade union membership or activities); (ii) although workers have the right not to have inducements made to give up collective bargaining rights, this applies only where the union is recognized or seeking to be recognized (section 145B of TULRA); it does not apply where the union has been derecognized; (iii) where an employer makes inducements to workers to give up union representation, the union has no standing to bring legal proceedings to complain about the violation of its rights (sections 145A(5)–145B(5) of TULRA); this is an important omission, particularly in cases where workers who have been the subject of the inducement are unwilling to institute individual proceedings; and (iv) where the incumbent trade union is non-independent, a request for derecognition can only be made by an individual worker and not by an independent trade union; the independent trade union has no right of access to the workplace and no right to communicate with the workforce while derecognition procedures are taking place, while the non-independent union has a statutory right to communicate with the workers during the derecognition process. The Committee finally notes that the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) refers to various unfair practices and anti-union tactics in the framework of the statutory recognition scheme.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report additional information, including judicial decisions, on the protection provided against acts of anti-union discrimination, including those in which the employer's main purpose is not discriminatory, and against acts of interference.

Shipping sector. The Committee notes the issues raised by the TUC in relation to the shipping sector under Conventions Nos 147 and 180. Thus, according to the TUC, contracts of employment have been found to expressly forbid individuals from contacting a recognized trade union so as to favour the conclusion of "workforce agreements" with workers' representatives rather than collective agreements with trade unions, thereby lowering the terms and conditions of employment in this sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this regard.

Article 4 of the Convention. Statutory recognition procedure. The Committee's previous comments raised the need to ensure that under a system for nominating an exclusive bargaining agent, if there is no union representing the required percentage to be so designated (the majority vote in a ballot in which at least 40 per cent of the bargaining unit must vote in favour of union recognition), collective bargaining rights should be granted to all unions in a unit, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee notes that according to the Government, bargaining units in the United Kingdom cover both those who are members of the recognized union and those who are not members. In other words, trade unions are rarely, if ever, recognized just to bargain on behalf of their own members only. This tradition ensures that bargaining structures are relatively simple and that workers in the same job or occupational category are not paid by reference to different systems of pay determination. There are thus no plans to introduce any new provisions enabling minority trade unions to bargain on behalf of their own members only. Nevertheless, minority unions are still entitled to provide important services to their members, in relation for instance, to disciplinary or grievance hearings.

The Committee once again recalls that problems of conformity with the principle of the promotion of collective bargaining, set out in the Convention, may arise when the law stipulates that a trade union must receive the support of the majority of the members of a bargaining unit to be recognized as a bargaining agent, since a union which fails to secure this absolute majority is thus denied the possibility of bargaining. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to review in consultation with the social partners, the TULRA as amended by the Employment Relations Acts of 1999 and 2004, so as to verify that the provisions on trade union recognition for collective bargaining purposes do not prevent trade unions in workplaces where no union meets the percentage requirements for recognition (40 per cent), from engaging in collective bargaining on behalf of their own members on a voluntary basis.

Collective bargaining in small businesses. The Committee's previous comments concerned the TUC's indication that businesses employing less than 21 workers are excluded from the statutory procedure for union recognition, the effect of which has been to deny the employees of these small businesses the right to be represented by a trade union (Schedule 1A, paragraph 7(1) of TULRA).

The Committee notes that according to the Government, it would be inappropriate to subject very small organizations to the detailed legal requirements of the statutory recognition procedure. Trade unions are recognized by some very small employers through voluntary agreement. The Government acknowledges that recognized trade unions can operate very effectively in micro businesses. To demonstrate this fact, the Government helped finance an innovative research project with the UNITE union and community trade unions to identify the positive effects recognized trade unions can bring to small businesses. That research project was completed in April 2007, and the Government would expect it to be used by trade unions and employers to understand the role of the trade union in very small organizations. In addition, the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service (CAS) and the Labour Relations Agency (LRA) in Northern Ireland, which are Government-funded, can provide advice to employers and trade unions on the issues which arise in any matter relating to the establishment and operation of union recognition arrangements. CAS/LRA can also provide conciliation services, at the joint request of both parties, to resolve any difficulties or disputes about trade union recognition.

The Committee notes that according to the latest comments made by the TUC, it would be possible to have a simplified statutory procedure for small businesses which reconciles the fundamental rights of the workers with the circumstances of the business. The TUC is also not aware of the UNITE/community unions innovative research project to which the Government refers; it wonders whether the report recommends any changes to the law.

The Committee emphasizes that in accordance with the free and voluntary nature of collective bargaining, it should be possible for all workers and employers, with the possible exceptions contained in Article 6 of the Convention, to engage in collective bargaining. The Committee invites the Government to examine this matter with the social partners and requests it to furnish statistical data on the number and coverage of collective agreements, particularly in small businesses.

Bermuda

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It also notes the comments made by the Bermuda Public Services Union (BPSU).

Protection against employer interference. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate any measures envisaged to amend the 1998 Trade Union Amendment Act, which took effect on 1 May 2000, so as to further protect against any possible employer intimidation or interference in respect of union certification or decertification. The Committee recalls that this request originated in the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1959 (320th Report, approved by the Governing Body at its 277th Session in March 2000). Recalling that in its previous report the Government had noted that this matter is still under consideration, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged to further protect against any possible employer intimidation or interference in respect of union certification or decertification.

Coverage of management personnel. In its previous comments the Committee, taking note of the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1959 and the Government's commitment to the objective of including management personnel within the scope of the provisions of the Trade Union Amendment Act, despite the defeat of an amendment to this effect in the Senate in August 1999, requested the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged in order to include management personnel within the scope of the Act and guarantee to them the rights established by the Convention. The Committee notes the comments made by the BPSU according to which there are no pending amendments to the Trade Union Amendment Act 1998, consolidated under the Trade Union Act, so as to afford management personnel the rights established by the Convention. The BPSU also refers to a case of denial of the right to organize to the middle management staff of a public institution. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged in order to include management personnel within the scope of the Trade Union Act so as to guarantee to them the rights established by the Convention.

The Committee hopes that, in the near future, it will note substantial progress in the application of the Convention.

Guernsey

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination. Following its previous comments regarding the strengthening of sanctions concerning unfair dismissal, the Committee notes with satisfaction that the new legislation entitled "The Employment Protection (Guernsey) (Amendment) Law, 2005" foresees a six-month pay sanction award for unfair dismissal, which may be greater depending on the circumstances of the case, in law and in equity.

Jersey

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)

The Committee takes note of the Employment Relations (Jersey) Law 2007 (ERL) which entered into force on 21 January 2008, as well its accompanying draft codes of practice which once adopted, will be "admissible in evidence and may be taken into account in determining any question arising in proceedings before the Jersey Employment Tribunal [JET] or a court" (introduction to the draft codes). The Committee also notes the comments made on this issue by the Unite union in a communication dated 20 November 2007. The Committee finally recalls the conclusions and recommendations reached on the ERL and its accompanying codes by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2473 (349th Report, paragraphs 261–278).

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes. The Committee notes that the ERL does not confer any positive right to strike, but rather gives in article 19 specific immunity to an act (breach of contract) which would otherwise be tortious unless carried out by a registered union in contemplation of furtherance of an “employment dispute”. However, where a worker participates in a lawful strike, there is no right in the ERL for such worker to return to work after the strike, but rather only a right to compensation for unfair dismissal, provided for in article 77 of the ERL. The Committee therefore observes that under the ERL, the right to strike is not effectively guaranteed given that workers may not be able to return to work after having lawfully exercised this right.

Furthermore, the Committee notes with interest from the Government’s report that the draft Employment (Amendment No. 4)(Jersey) Law adopted on 22 October 2008 and currently subject to Privy Council approval – will amend the ERL so that under articles 77G and 77C, a tribunal can issue an order of reinstatement or re-engagement (i.e. re-employment under terms which, as far as possible, are as favourable as if the employee had been reinstated, unless the employee was partly to blame for the dismissal). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report progress made in the adoption of this law.

The Committee notes that under article 19 of the ERL, a strike is immune from tort only if it takes place in the framework of an “employment dispute”; according to article 20(3) of the ERL, immunity is lost if the conduct of a trade union does not conform to the definition of “reasonable conduct” when done in contemplation or furtherance of a dispute; the definition of “reasonable conduct” is found in code 2 which provides that it would be unreasonable conduct for a union to call upon employees to take part in secondary action. The Committee recalls that a general prohibition of sympathy strikes could lead to abuse and workers should be able to take such action where the initial strike they are supporting is itself lawful (General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 168). The Committee also notes that the right to strike should not be limited solely to industrial disputes that are likely to be resolved through the signing of a collective agreement and that workers’ organizations should, in principle, be able to use strike action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection and the standard of living. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to ensure that secondary action and social and economic protest action are protected under the law.

The Committee notes furthermore, that code 2 provides that there is no immunity from tort for picketing or calling upon employees to picket a place of work other than that of the employees as well as for interference (e.g. because of noise or crowds) in the rights of neighbouring properties (i.e. private nuisance) and for trespassing on private property. The Committee is of the view that picketing in support of secondary action should be possible and that restrictions on strike pickets should be limited to cases where the action ceases to be peaceful (General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 174). The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to ensure that pickets in support of secondary action is possible and that limitations on strike pickets apply only where the action ceases to be peaceful.

The Committee notes that an “employment dispute” can be according to article 1(1) of the ERL, either individual or collective; a collective employment dispute is defined in article 5 of the ERL as one taking place where a collective agreement already exists. According to Unite, this provision allows the employer to deny union immunity for industrial action simply by terminating the collective agreement; furthermore, in case of a recognition dispute where no collective agreement exists, the conditions allowing for strikes to be staged are met under article 5 of the ERL only where the employer employs more than 21 employees; thus, according to comments made by Unite, industrial action to further a recognition claim in small establishments is not immune from action in tort. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the comments made by Unite and to indicate in its next report the measures taken to ensure that the conditions for protected industrial action are not such as to render such action virtually impossible, especially in relation to recognition disputes in small establishments.

The Committee observes that articles 22 and 24 of the ERL provide that in the absence of the parties’ consent to the terms of a binding award, the JET can issue a declaration which is de facto and de jure integrated in individual contracts of employment and is therefore tantamount to binding arbitration. Code 3 contains similar provisions. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration seriously limits the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members as well as their right to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes and is not compatible with Article 3 of Convention No. 87 (General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 153). The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to ensure that compulsory arbitration is only possible in the case of essential services in the strict sense of the term, public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or where both parties agree to binding arbitration.

The Committee notes that code 2 provides that “a small island community such as Jersey may have services which are considered essential to society which are different to those in the mainland United Kingdom, for example, a stoppage in transport links services would cause greater difficulties and inconveniences that are detrimental to the population”. The Committee recalls that transportation is not an essential service in the strict sense of the term where strikes may be prohibited; however, in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of all proportion to the occupational interests of the parties to the dispute, the authorities could establish a system of negotiated minimum service in services which are of public utility rather than impose an outright ban on strikes (General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 160). The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated to amend code 2 so as to ensure that transportation is not included among essential services, taking account of the possibility of introducing a negotiated minimum service.

The Committee notes that article 3 of the ERL and code 2 contain a requirement of notice prior to industrial action; the notice should contain such information as to help the employer make plans to enable it to advise its customers of the possibility of disruption, so that they can make alternative arrangements or to take steps to ensure the health and safety of the employees, or the public, or to safeguard equipment which might otherwise suffer damage from being shut down or left without supervision. While noting that the obligation to give prior notice before calling a strike is in line with the Convention, the Committee also notes the comments by Unite according to which in one English case, an injunction was granted by the court to stop an industrial action because the union had failed to identify the specific site where each lecturer on strike had their desk, despite the fact that the union had specified the exact number of lecturers, the grade of every lecturer, and the department or sub-department in which they worked; Unite emphasizes that there is no explicit provision to ensure that there is no obligation to name employees who participate in a strike and to confine the information to be provided only to that which is in the union's possession. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the comments made by Unite and to indicate any judicial decisions relevant to the application by the courts of articles 3 and 20(2) of the ERL as well as code 3.

The Committee finally notes from the Government's report that further consultation and progress on the legislation is planned once a new Minister for Social Security is appointed after the elections presently taking place in Jersey; it is anticipated that a substantive review or programme of consultation will be undertaken following the Minister's formal appointment in December 2008. The Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to indicate in its next report progress made with regard to reviewing the provisions of the ERL, the accompanying draft codes of practice as well as the draft Employment (Amendment No. 4)(Jersey) Law so as to ensure that trade unions enjoy the full guarantee of the rights available under the Convention.

The Committee takes note of the Employment Relations (Jersey) Law 2007 (ERL) which entered into force on 21 January 2008, as well as its accompanying draft codes of practice which once adopted, will be "admissible in evidence and may be taken into account in determining any question arising in proceedings before the Jersey Employment Tribunal [JET] or a court" (introduction to the draft codes). The Committee also notes the comments made on this issue by the Unite union in a communication dated 20 November 2007. The Committee finally recalls the conclusions and recommendations reached on the ERL and its accompanying codes by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2473 (349th Report, approved by the Governing Body at its 301st Session (March 2008), paragraphs 261–278).

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the Employment (Jersey) Law, 2003 (EL) provides that a dismissal is automatically unfair, from day one of employment, where an employee claims to have been dismissed on grounds relating to: being or proposing to become a trade union member; taking part in, or proposing to take part in, trade union activities at an appropriate time; not being a trade union member, or refusing to become (or remain) a member; and selection for redundancy on grounds relating to union membership or activities.

The Committee also notes with interest from the Government's report, that pursuant to the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2473, the draft Employment (Amendment No. 4)(Jersey) Law was adopted on 22 October 2008 and is subject to Privy Council approval. The Committee notes that this Law amends the ERL so that under articles 77G and 77C, where a worker has been unfairly dismissed by reason of participation in lawful trade union activities, a Tribunal can issue an order of reinstatement or re-engagement (under terms which are, as far as possible, as favourable as if the employee had been reinstated, unless the employee was partly to blame for the dismissal). The Committee also notes, however, that according to article 77B and 77C, the Tribunal shall not have the power to compensate an employee for financial losses such as arrears of pay for the period between the dismissal and the order for re-employment, the reason being that such a possibility of back pay, would render the re-employment option more financially advantageous than the financial compensation currently available to unfairly dismissed employees. The draft also provides that any other rights and privileges, including any improvements in terms and conditions that the employee would have been entitled to, must be restored to the employee from the date of re-employment and not before.

The Committee recalls that the purpose of compensation for acts of anti-union discrimination must be to compensate fully, both in financial and in occupational terms, the prejudice suffered by a worker (General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 219). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to review the provisions of the draft Employment (Amendment

No. 4)(Jersey) Law so as to ensure fuller protection and compensation against any prejudice suffered by workers by reason of legitimate trade union activities.

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee notes from the Government's report that there are currently no specific provisions relating to this issue in the EL or the ERL. However, it is the Minister's intention to introduce via the ERL a positive duty to prohibit employers from "buying out" employees' rights in respect of union activities by inducing employees not to join a workers' organization, or to relinquish membership of such an organization. This issue was raised in the framework of consultations on the EL and the ERL and the Minister intends that the matter should be given further consideration in the preparation of an amendment. The Committee notes that according to the comments made by the Unite trade union, Code 1 provides that where no prior collective agreement exists in a workplace, recognition may be granted to a trade union for collective bargaining purposes only where there are no employees in the bargaining unit in respect of whom the employer already recognizes one or more trade unions for the purposes of collective bargaining; such provisions enable the employer to recognize any union in respect of any employees even if the union is not representative, thereby preventing a representative union from accessing the statutory recognition procedure; moreover, the Code does not specify that the union so recognized should be independent. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these comments and to keep it informed of any measures taken or contemplated so as to introduce provisions prohibiting acts of interference by employers or their organizations in the establishment, functioning or administration of workers' organizations and vice-versa (and in particular, against acts designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers' organizations, or to support workers' organizations by financial or other means, with the object of placing such organizations under the control of employers or employers' organizations) as well as provisions ensuring rapid procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee notes from the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2473 that article 1 of the ERL prevents agreements from qualifying as "collective agreements" within the law, unless concluded between an employer and a trade union representing a "substantial proportion of the employees engaged in the trade or industry concerned". In this respect, the Committee notes that according to Code 1, a key criterion for trade union recognition is the wish of the majority of employees and therefore, an employer should only be required to recognize a trade union where it can be clearly demonstrated that the majority of the employees within the bargaining unit want the trade union to be recognized by the employer. The Committee recalls that where, under a system for nominating an exclusive bargaining agent, there is no union representing the required percentage to be so designated, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all unions in a unit, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report information on the measures taken or contemplated so as to ensure that where no union represents the majority of employees in a bargaining unit, collective bargaining rights are granted to all unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members.

The Committee finally notes from the Government's report that further consultation and progress on the legislation is planned once a new Minister for Social Security is appointed after the elections presently taking place in Jersey; it is anticipated that a substantive review or programme of consultation will be undertaken following the Minister's formal appointment in December 2008. The Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to indicate in its next report progress made with regard to reviewing the provisions of the EL, the ERL and its accompanying draft codes of practice as well as the draft Employment (Amendment No. 4) (Jersey) Law, so as to ensure that workers and their organizations enjoy the full guarantee of the rights available under the Convention.

Uruguay

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1954)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2008, which refer to anti-union dismissals and an act of violence against a leader of the Uruguayan Federation of Commercial and Industrial Employees (FUECI). The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on these matters with its next report.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government reports that: (1) the national legislation does not include a single and complete text regulating collective bargaining and, consequently, part of the doctrine maintains that in Uruguay there are two collective bargaining models: the typical model and the model set up as a result of the convening of wages councils; (2) the re-establishment of wages councils in 2005 has revitalized both unionization and collective bargaining; (3) wages councils are tripartite bodies which have the task of setting minimum wages by category and branch of activity, and, although their basic task is to set minimum wages and categories, both through the application of other sections of Act No. 10449 (which establishes an entire system of collective bargaining for wages councils) and through practice, their powers have been expanded in the sense that they act as conciliation bodies in collective disputes, negotiating other working conditions and regulating trade union leave, etc; (4) in 2005, three bodies were set up at the general level: the Higher Tripartite Council, the Higher Rural Council and the body for negotiation in the public sector and, as a consequence, 20 groups of wages councils have been set up covering nearly 200 negotiating areas; (5) the results were widely successful and, in more than 95 per cent of them, agreement was reached and, in the rest, matters were resolved by vote; a framework agreement was concluded in the public sector and several in the rural sector, and a third round of negotiations is planned for this year.

In this regard, while observing that the objective of wages councils in Uruguay has historically been to promote collective bargaining, the Committee observes that the possibility of a vote being held in the tripartite councils for setting conditions of employment infringes upon the principle of free and voluntary negotiation, which constitutes an essential aspect of the principles of freedom of association. The Committee recalls that setting minimum wages may be the subject of decisions by tripartite bodies. However, with regard to other conditions of work, the Committee emphasizes that, in accordance with the principles of free and voluntary collective bargaining between parties, established under Article 4 of the Convention, conditions of work should be set, without interference by the public authorities, by workers' organizations and employers or their organizations. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take measures to promote collective bargaining as outlined above.

Finally, the Committee notes that the Government reports that the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, the Planning and Budget Office and the Inter-Trade Union Assembly–Workers' National Convention (PIT–CNT) prepared a draft law on collective bargaining for the public sector which is being considered by the National Parliament. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made with regard to the draft law in question.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 28 August 2007 and the Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production of Venezuela (FEDECAMARAS), received on 27 August 2008. Finally, the Committee notes the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association relating to the cases presented by national and international organizations of workers (Case No. 2422) and of employers (Case No. 2254). In its previous observations, the Committee noted the conclusions of the high-level mission which visited the country in January 2006.

Legislative issues

The Committee recalls that it previously raised the following issues:

- the need to adopt the Bill to amend the Basic Labour Act so as to eliminate the restrictions placed on the exercise of the rights granted by the Convention to workers' and employers' organizations. On this issue, the Committee made the following comments:

The Committee previously noted that a Bill to amend the Basic Labour Act took account of requests for amendment that it had made on the following points: (1) it deletes sections 408 and 409 (over-detailed enumeration of the mandatory functions and purposes of workers' and employers' organizations); (2) it reduces from ten to five years the required period of residence before a foreign worker may hold office in an executive body of a trade union organization (it should be noted that the new Regulations of the Basic Labour Act establish that trade union statutes may provide for the election of foreign nationals as trade union leaders); (3) it reduces from 100 to 40 the number of workers required to establish a trade union of independent workers; (4) it reduces from ten to four the number of employers required to establish an employers' organization; (5) it provides that the technical cooperation and logistical support of the electoral authority (National Electoral Council) for the organization of elections to executive bodies of trade unions shall be provided only where so requested by the trade union organizations in accordance with the provisions of their statutes, and that elections held without the participation of the National Electoral Council and which comply with the statutes of the trade unions concerned shall have full legal effect once the corresponding reports are submitted to the appropriate labour inspectorate. The Committee noted that the authorities of the Ministry and of the legislative authority support the position set out in this provision of the Bill and that, in practice, trade unions have now held elections without the participation of the National Electoral Council. The Committee also noted that the Bill provided that "in accordance with the constitutional principle of democratic changeover, the executive board of a trade union organization shall discharge its functions during the period established by the statutes of the organization, but in no case may a period in excess of three years be established". The Committee hoped that the legislative authority would include in the Bill a provision explicitly allowing the re-election of trade union leaders.

- the need for the National Electoral Council (CNE), which is not a judicial body, to cease interfering in trade union elections and to no longer be empowered to annul them, and the need for the statute for the election of executive bodies of national (trade union) organizations, which accords a preponderant role to the CNE in the various stages of such elections, to be amended or repealed;
- certain provisions of the Regulations of the Basic Labour Act, dated 25 April 2006, might restrict the rights of trade union organizations and employers' organizations: (1) the necessity for the trade union organization(s) to represent the majority of the workers to be able to engage in collective bargaining (section 115, sole paragraph, of the Regulations); and (2) the possibility of compulsory arbitration in certain essential public services (section 152 of the Regulations). The Committee noted the Government's indication in its report that where there is no majority trade union, the minority unions can negotiate jointly;

- the Committee also noted the criticisms made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) concerning resolution No. 3538 of February 2005 and observed that this issue had already been examined in March 2006 in Case No. 2411 by the Committee on Freedom of Association, which made the following recommendation (see 340th Report, paragraph 1400): “(b) Regarding the allegations relating to the Ministry of Labour resolution of 3 February 2005, giving trade union organizations 30 days to provide information on their administration and register of members in a form that includes each worker's full identity, place of residence and signature, the Committee considers that the confidentiality of trade union membership should be ensured and recalls that it would be advisable to establish, between trade unions, a code of conduct governing the conditions in which membership data is to be supplied, with the use of appropriate means of personal data processing, with guarantees of absolute confidentiality.”
The Committee requests the Government to adopt measures in this respect.

The Committee notes that, with regard to the legislative issues, the Government indicates that the Bill to reform the Basic Labour Act is at the consultation stage and that it will keep the Committee informed of any developments in this regard. Furthermore, the Government reiterates the information provided with regard to the Statutes for the election of trade union executive bodies. In reply to the observation concerning alleged deficiencies in social dialogue, the Government reiterates that it has demonstrated the extent of the participation of various social partners, including all social actors. The Government reiterates its comments made in its 2007 report.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) insinuations of violations of Convention No. 87 are undermined by the number of trade union organizations that are established (247 over the past six months) and the number of collective agreements approved (612 in 2007 covering 5,637,799 workers and 192 thus far in 2008 covering 42,625 workers); (2) the Bill to reform the Basic Labour Act continues to be on the legislative agenda, has the consensus support of the social partners and gives effect to the comments of the Committee of Experts; (3) consideration will be given to the inclusion in the above Bill of the possibility of re-electing the executive boards of trade union organizations, by determining the interpretation of the “changeover” referred to in article 21 of the Constitution; non-intervention in trade union elections is applied in practice and resolution 13 of the Ministry reaffirms the optional nature of the intervention of the CNE; (4) the CNE has prepared draft standards governing the election of trade union organizations; (5) the new Regulations of the Basic Labour Act include improvements in relation to trade union elections intended to prevent delays in elections; isolated cases of alleged violations have been presented as the general pattern and the Government has provided its observations in this respect to the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 2422); and (6) it welcomes the offer of ILO technical assistance and will provide information on when and under what circumstances such assistance might be required.

The Committee notes with regret that for more than eight years, the Bill to reform the Basic Labour Act has been awaiting adoption by the Legislative Assembly, despite the fact that it has tripartite consensus support. Taking into account the significance of the restrictions which persist in the legislation with regard to freedom of association and the freedom to organize, the Committee once again urges the Government to take measures to accelerate the examination by the Legislative Assembly of the Bill to reform the Basic Labour Act and to ensure that the CNE ceases to interfere in trade union elections (the CNE's new draft on elections improves the situation but this non-legal body is still present at elections in different ways and resolves any appeals) and the statute for the election of trade union and national executive bodies is repealed. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the scope of the Regulations of the Basic Labour Act in relation to compulsory arbitration in basic or strategic services and to amend the resolution of the Ministry of Labour, dated 3 February 2005, as indicated above.

Shortcomings in social dialogue

In successive observations in recent years the Committee has identified considerable shortcomings in social dialogue. The International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the Venezuelan Workers' Confederation (CTV), the General Confederation of Venezuelan Workers (CGT) and the Venezuelan Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Associations of Commerce and Production (FEDECAMARAS) have indicated that the authorities only hold formal consultations without the intention of taking into account the views of the parties consulted and that there is no authentic dialogue. Moreover, there are no structures for such dialogue and the Government does not convene the tripartite commission envisaged in the Basic Labour Act.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that: (1) it considers it essential that the high-level mission has noted the readiness of the Government and the social partners to embark on social dialogue which includes all actors and that both FEDECAMARAS and the CTV have participated in various meetings to discuss the regulations to be adopted under various laws; (2) the Government is convinced that the ideal dynamic to maintain a growing economy is, as has been demonstrated, through the promotion of inclusive, democratic, participatory and productive dialogue; it believes in broad and inclusive dialogue and, through this practice, it gives effect to the provisions of section 62 et seq. of the Regulations of the Basic Labour Act which legitimizes the broad basis for social dialogue; (3) this practice is demonstrated by the number of collective agreements registered and the number of trade union organizations established (mentioned above); (4) nowadays, workers are members of numerous trade union organizations, with various political and ideological tendencies, and given this range of organizations, it is possible that some organizations which historically represented workers and employers exclusively, mistakenly claim that their former privileges are undervalued and allege favouritism; the new State of social justice includes all partners, without any favouritism or exclusion; (5) the State of Venezuela guarantees, respect and protects the exercise of freedom of association, both in its individual sphere and collectively, and therefore guarantees ideological and religious freedom, given that trade union action is seen as a direct expression of political pluralism, the essential basis for the democratic State of law and justice established by the Constitution; (6) the Government notes with great interest the observation of the Committee of Experts in 2007 concerning the alleged actions of certain middle-ranking officials in relation to allegations of favouritism or partiality with regard to certain workers' and employers' organizations; it reiterates that such attitudes do not reflect the usual and repeated behaviour of public servants; the Government's position is that public servants have a duty to deal with the questions and issues raised and complaints made by the various social partners, without distinction whatsoever.

The Committee notes the comments made by FEDECAMARAS on the application of the Convention that: (1) the Government fails to recognize FEDECAMARAS as the most representative organization and has imposed the representation of recently created organizations whose independent and representative nature is questioned by FEDECAMARAS since CONFAGAN, FEDEINDUSTRIA and EMPREVEN are institutions which follow Government policy and are neither independent, representative nor autonomous; (2) there is a complete absence of the necessary basic social dialogue and tripartite consultation as a consultation mechanism. In this regard, on 31 July 2008, the third Enabling Act, which authorized the President of the Republic to issue decrees with the rank, value and force of law expired. On the same day and under that authority, 26 new legislative decrees together with the amendment of other Acts with an impact on enterprises and operations in Venezuela were announced. The announcements were made in the summary of the Official Gazette of 31 July 2008 and published in extraordinary gazettes published subsequently. They include Acts relating to labour regulation; (i) the Act partially reforming the Basic Act on the Social Security System; (ii) the Act partially reforming the Social Insurance Act, and (iii) the Act on Housing Services and Habitat. Furthermore, 26 laws were also announced; and (3) this Enabling Act, as was the case with the two previous, has not been the subject of the prior consultation provided for in the Constitution as a prerequisite for its approval and subsequent publication. The legislative decrees infringe the Constitution in force by contradicting the principle of participatory democracy and by incorporating in their texts elements rejected in the referendum held on 2 December 2007 on the reform of the Constitution; the Constitution provides that Venezuela is a social State of law and justice, but the legislative decrees mentioned above generally have three fundamental things in common: they provide for greater institutional ideologization (with a view to creating a socialist economy and eliminating the free market) and they provide for greater control through intervention in the economy and commerce and centralized planning.

In its comments of 29 September 2007, the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) tackled some of these issues and pointed out that, through measures against economic freedom, private property and private initiative, the political pluralism established in the Constitution of 1999 is being replaced with an ideology based on a single and mandatory State.

Furthermore, according to FEDECAMARAS, for the past nine years, the Government has not convened the National Tripartite Committee, in accordance with the procedure provided for under sections 167 and 168 of the Basic Labour Act on minimum wages. The Government merely invokes section 172 which refers to the disproportionate increase in the cost of living, and does not consult FEDECAMARAS. Wage increases have been the result of Presidential decrees without due consultation being held with any sector. The Government's practice is to send consultation notices at very short notice and, on occasion, the correspondence has arrived after the date of publication of the decree concerned.

The Committee notes with concern these comments by FEDECAMARAS and regrets that the Government has not sent its reply on this matter. The Committee observes that, in its latest examination of Case No. 2254 in June 2008, the Committee on Freedom of Association concluded that very serious deficiencies had been identified in social dialogue. It emerges from its conclusions that the Government has not carried out the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association with regard to its repeated request to: (1) establish a national, high-level joint committee in Venezuela with the assistance of the ILO, to examine each and every one of the allegations and matters presented in order to resolve problems through direct dialogue; (2) establish a forum for social dialogue in accordance with the principles of the ILO, having a tripartite composition which duly respects the representativeness of workers' and employers' organizations; and (3) convene the tripartite committee on minimum wages provided for in the Basic Labour Act.

The Committee, like the Committee on Freedom of Association, noting that there are still no structured bodies for tripartite social dialogue, once again emphasizes the importance that should be attached to full and frank consultation taking place on any questions or proposed legislation affecting trade union rights and that it is essential that the introduction of draft legislation affecting collective bargaining or conditions of employment should be preceded by full and detailed consultations with the independent and most representative workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that any legislation adopted concerning labour, social and economic issues within the framework of the Enabling Act be subject to real, in-depth consultations with the independent and most representative employers' and workers' organizations, while attempting as far as possible to find shared solutions.

The Committee once again invites the Government to request the technical assistance of the ILO for the establishment of the dialogue bodies mentioned and to ensure that the views of the most representative organizations are duly taken into account in the attempt as far as possible to reach mutually acceptable solutions. In this context, it is important, taking into account the allegations of discrimination against FEDECAMARAS, the CTV and their member organizations, including the establishment or promotion of organizations or enterprises close to the regime, that the Government is guided exclusively by criteria of representativeness in its dialogue and relations with workers' and employers' organizations and that it refrains, as indicated by the Conference Committee in 2007, from any form of interference and complies with Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in social dialogue and its outcome, and to promote seriously the establishment of the dialogue bodies mentioned which, it strongly hopes, will be established in the very near future.

Comments of the ITUC

The ITUC refers to various matters being dealt with by the Committee. The ITUC adds that the right to collective bargaining and the right to strike are gradually being weakened. The criminalization of strikes and demonstrations, as well as the interference in trade union autonomy, as a result of the intervention of the CNE in trade union elections, are contributing to this weakening. There have been reports of violations by the Labour Inspectorate and the SIVENSA Group.

According to the ITUC, the Regulations of the Basic Labour Act, amended on 25 April 2006, introduce a number of improvements to the legislation but establish the trade union referendum to confirm the representativeness of trade union organizations in the case of bargaining or collective labour disputes. This referendum mechanism is regulated entirely by the Ministry of Labour, which could also be interpreted as a veiled way for the State, as the main employer, to legitimize and interfere in the life of trade unions. Furthermore, the ITUC adds that unions are required to provide the identity of their members given that the resolution which requires trade union organizations to "deliver, within 30 days, the data on their administration and the identity of each member, in a form that includes each worker's full identity, place of residence and signature" remains in force.

The ITUC reports acts of violence and arrests of trade unionists in its comments of 2006 and 2008. Labour conflicts associated with the award of jobs in the construction and oil sectors and, to a lesser extent, in basic industries, continues to be a source of great concern. According to data from the Venezuelan Programme on Human Resources Education and Action (PROVEA) between September 2006 and October 2007, at least 95 persons were affected by violence. These included 69 trade union leaders and 26 workers. According to this organization, "the use of trade union assassinations is aggravating the climate of violence and insecurity, which is extremely detrimental to the exercise of trade union activities". Various trade union organizations have asked the Ministry of Justice to investigate cases of assassinations and punish the culprits.

Furthermore, the ITUC points out that the right to strike has been gradually limited and several workers who were making labour claims have been repressed and penalized. This is the case for ten leaders of the Union of Workers of Sanitarios Maracay who, in May 2007, were intercepted and arrested by National Guard forces and the police of Aragua as they were heading to Caracas to present to the National Assembly the situation of workers reflected in a list of demands. After several demonstrations and pressure by trade union leaders of the National Workers' Union (UNT), the trade unionists were freed, but the Office of the Attorney General accused the trade unionists of violating section 357 of the Penal Code and ordered them to appear before it every 15 days.

The ITUC reports that a representative of the Federation of Telecommunication Workers (FETRATEL) counted 243 collective agreements unsigned and at a standstill in the public sector and stated that "the Government does not believe in the trade union leaders promoting these agreements", which is the most serious problem to tackle. A leader of the National Union of Workers (UNT) refers to the situation with regard to collective bargaining as "alarming"; one of the cases concerns the public administration framework agreement, which has not been discussed for 27 months, and the agreement of the workers of the Ministry of Labour, which has not been discussed for 16 years. The labour representative of the Broad Popular Front (FAP) has counted 3,500 collective agreements which have not been discussed.

The ITUC also reports that the Venezuelan Federation of Teachers (FVM) and the 27 trade union organizations affiliated to it presented a complaint to the ILO calling on the Venezuelan State to restore the right to collective bargaining, denied since March 2006.

The Committee requests the Government to reply to the comments made by the ITUC in 2006 and 2008. The Committee emphasizes that freedom of association can only be exercised in conditions in which fundamental rights are fully respected and guaranteed and that the rights of workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressures or threats of any kind against trade union and employers' leaders and their respective organizations.

Other comments of FEDECAMARAS

According to FEDECAMARAS, more than one year ago, on 24 May 2007, its headquarters were attacked by representatives of the Ezequiel Zamora National Campesino Front, the Simón Bolívar National Communal Front, the Alexis Vive Collective and the Coordinadora Simón Bolívar, including acts of violence against the institution and its property. Later, in the early hours of 24 February 2008, a metropolitan police inspector died (according to documents provided by FEDECAMARAS) as a result of the explosion of a device that had been planted at the front of the FEDECAMARAS headquarters building. The appropriate report was made to the Office of the State Prosecutor, requesting the most comprehensive and exhaustive investigation into the events and the identification of those responsible, but to date no result has been achieved.

Furthermore, FEDECAMARAS states that anyone who is engaged in noteworthy trade union activities and who reports the Government to the media for constant violations of the Constitution and of the laws protecting their interests (protesting at the kidnappings of their members and price and exchange rate controls) is immediately prejudiced in their enterprises and in respect of their property as a means of exerting pressure, as was the case for the President and Vice-President of the National Federation of Stockbreeders (FEDENAGA). Several governmental organizations such as the National Integrated Tax Administration Service (SENIAT) and the Institute for the Defence and Education of the Consumer (INDECU) sent their prosecutors to the enterprises in order to prepare reports and fine the enterprises concerned.

With regard to land, the National Guard, together with the National Institute for Land (INT), intervene – on the pretext of recovering land – on productive lands, therefore affecting the national supply of agricultural and livestock products. The INT should not intervene on these private lands, but it demands the production of the legal antecedents and, when this is produced, it invalidates the historic title deeds showing that the land is private property. This practice constitutes “prior occupation”, which violates the Constitution and due process. It should be highlighted that “prior occupation” was proposed in the draft Constitution on which a referendum was held last December and was rejected. As a result of the work carried out by members in defence of these rights, trade union representatives and private employers in general are permanently harassed and threatened by the Government, as was the case most recently when the facilities of the transnational cement company CEMEX were seized.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not sent a reply to these comments, although prior to those comments it pointed out that it had ordered the capture of two alleged perpetrators of the attack on the FEDECAMARAS headquarters. The Committee recalls that acts of violence and intimidation against employers’ leaders, their organizations or their members are incompatible with the Convention. The Committee once again expresses its deep concern and recalls the gravity of these allegations and emphasizes that a movement of trade unions or employers can only develop where fundamental human rights are respected and in a climate free of violence of any kind. The Committee recalls that, in 2007, the Conference Committee requested the Government to take measures to investigate these incidents so that those responsible could be punished and similar events did not occur in future and it requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

The Committee welcomes the fact that the employers’ leader, Ms Albis Muñoz has been granted an amnesty, but notes with regret that the warrant for the arrest issued against the former President of FEDECAMARAS, Mr Carlos Fernández, which is preventing him from returning to the country without reprisal, remains in force.

Other matters

The Committee previously noted that a number of trade union organizations (300 unions according to the ITUC, due to a lack of authorization by the National Electoral Council), including certain trade union federations, had not held their trade union elections despite the expiry of the period for which they had elected their executive bodies. The high-level mission of 2006 referred to a profound and manifest misunderstanding among the social partners concerning the functions of the CNE. In the absence of a reply from the Government on this point, the Committee emphasizes the importance of holding such elections since, as indicated in the report of the high-level mission, any delay in the procedures is accompanied by the non-recognition of trade unions for the purposes of collective bargaining.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1968)

The Committee notes the Government’s report and other communications.

The Committee recalls that it previously asked the Government to provide information on: (1) the cases that have arisen in recent years in which two trade union organizations claimed to be the most representative; (2) the criteria used in practice by the authorities to determine the most representative trade union; and (3) the number of cases in which the decision of the administrative authority has been challenged in a court of law, indicating the grounds put forward by the complainant trade union organization.

The Committee notes that the Government points out that the criteria used to determine the most representative trade union is that provided for in the Regulations of the Basic Labour Act concerning trade union referendums and that it is not aware of any appeals being lodged against decisions concerning the representativeness of trade unions. The Committee observes that the Government has not sent specific information concerning the cases in which, given that two trade union organizations claimed to be the most representative, the labour authority would have had to have issued a decision.

In this regard, taking into account the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that: (1) the collective bargaining processes in various sectors have been at a standstill since 2006 (it points out that 243 collective agreements have not been signed and more than 3,500 have not been discussed), and (2) that the trade union referendum mechanism could be a form of state interference in trade union life, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the cases in which two trade union organizations claimed to be the most representative, as well as on the administrative decisions adopted by the labour authority in accordance with the provisions on trade union referendums, and to send the texts of those provisions. The Committee also requests the Government to send its observations on the comments made by the ITUC on the situation with regard to collective bargaining.

Yemen

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in its communication dated 29 August 2008 referring to the issues pending before the Committee.

The Law on Trade Unions (2002). The Committee had previously raised a number of points in respect of the Law on Trade Unions. In the absence of the Government's reply thereon, the Committee must once again bring the Government's attention to the following issues.

Article 2 of the Convention.

- Exclusion from the scope of the Law of employees of high-level public authorities and Cabinets of Ministers (section 4). Considering that senior public officials should be entitled to establish their own organizations and that the legislation should limit this category to persons exercising senior managerial or policy-making responsibilities (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 57), the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the persons referred to in section 4 of the Law enjoy the right to establish and join trade unions.
- The reference to the General Federation of Trade Unions of Yemen (GFTUY) made in sections 2 (definition of "General Federation"), 20 and 21, could result in making it impossible to establish a second federation to represent workers' interests. The Committee considers that unification of the trade union movement imposed through state intervention by legislative means runs counter to the principle embodied in Articles 2 and 11 of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend the Law on Trade Union so as to repeal specific reference to the GFTUY and to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Article 3.

- Section 40(b) provides that a trade union organization can organize a strike in coordination with a trade union organization of the highest level. The Committee considers that a legislative provision which requires that a decision by the first-level trade union to call a strike at the local level should be approved by a higher level trade union body is not in conformity with the right of trade unions to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee requests the Government to clarify whether, section 40(b) requires an authorization from the higher level trade union for a strike to be organized and if that is the case, to take the necessary measures in order to amend the legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

The draft Labour Code. The Committee recalls that in its previous observations it had noted that a draft Labour Code was under discussion and that several of its provisions were not in conformity with the Convention. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the observations of the General Federation of Workers' Trade Unions of Yemen and the Employers' representatives, the ILO and the Committee of Experts have been taken into consideration and that following discussions with the social partners, the draft Code has been approved and referred to the Ministry of Legal Affairs. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the draft Code will not be adopted unless the amendments requested by the Committee and the interested parties have been made and the approval of the social partners has been obtained.

The Committee recalls that its previous comments on the draft Labour Code concerned the following issues:

Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation, it had requested the Government to ensure that domestic workers, the magistracy and the diplomatic corps, excluded from the draft Labour Code (section 3B(2) and (4)), may fully benefit from the rights set out in the Convention and to transmit the texts of any legislation or regulations ensuring their right to organize. The Committee had further requested the Government to consider revising section 173(2) of the draft Code so to ensure that minors between the ages of 16 and 18 may join trade unions without parental authorization and noted with interest the Government's intention to do so. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Committee's observations with regard to sections 3B and 173(2) of the draft Code have been taken into consideration. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this respect.

In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that foreign persons holding diplomatic passports and those working in Yemen on the basis of political visas were excluded from the scope of the draft Code under section 3B(6) and that this category of workers was covered by the specific legislation, regulations and agreements on reciprocal treatment. The Committee had therefore requested the Government to indicate whether this category of foreign workers could in practice establish and join organizations of their own choosing. In the light that no new information was provided by the Government, the Committee reiterates its previous request.

Article 3. With regard to the Committee's previous request to provide a list of essential services referred to in section 219(3) of the draft Code, which empowers the Minister to submit disputes to compulsory arbitration, the Committee once again notes the Government's indication that the Council of Ministers will issue such a list once the Labour Code is promulgated. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this respect.

Concerning section 211 of the draft Labour Code, which provides that strike notice must include an indication as to the duration of a strike, the Committee notes that the Government reiterates that it is willing to take into account the previous observation of the Committee to the effect that such a requirement unduly restricts the effectiveness of an essential means for furthering and defending workers' occupational interests. It requests the Government to indicate any progress made in this regard.

Articles 5 and 6. The Committee had previously noted that section 172 of the draft Labour Code would appear to prohibit the right of workers' organizations to affiliate with international workers' organizations and that the Government had concurred that this section contradicted section 66 of the Law on Trade Unions, which ensures the right to affiliate with international organizations and the current practice. The Committee therefore expressed trust that the Government would take the necessary measures to withdraw section 172 from the draft Labour Code. The Committee notes the Government's indication referring to the Law on Trade Unions which allows workers' organizations to affiliate with the Arab, regional and international trade union federations and to contribute to their establishment. According to the Government, this Law leaves no room for any other text that might contradict its provisions. The Committee therefore once again trusts that section 172 will be withdrawn from the draft Labour Code and requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect.

The Committee expresses the hope that the present legislative reform will bring the national legislation into full conformity with the Convention, in accordance with the comments above, and requests the Government to indicate any development in this regard.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1969)

Comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee notes the comments submitted by the ITUC in its communication dated 29 August 2008 and requests the Government to communicate its observations thereon.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union practices. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it had been requesting the Government to ensure that effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions that guarantee the protection of workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers or their organizations in trade union activities are expressly provided for in the national legislation. In its last observation, the Committee had noted the process of formulating the new draft legislative amendments to the Labour Code. It had further noted the Government's indication that it would endeavour to add provisions on penal responsibility of employers committing acts of anti-union discrimination and interference in trade union affairs in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government reiterates its previous statement and adds that the Committee's observation will be taken into account when making amendments to the Law on Trade Unions and supplementing the Penal Code. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the progress made in this respect and to provide a copy of the amended legislative texts as soon as they have been adopted.

Article 4 of the Convention. Power granted to the Ministry of Labour to refuse registration of a collective agreement on the basis of consideration of "economic interests of the country". The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend sections 32(6) and 34(2) of the Labour Code so as to ensure that refusal to register a collective agreement is only possible due to a procedural flaw or because it does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by the labour legislation and not on the basis of consideration of "the economic interests of the country". The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that it has adopted the Committee's proposal with regard to the amendment of the abovementioned section of the Labour Code. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the Labour Code is being revised by the Ministry of Legal Affairs before being submitted to the Council of Ministers and to the Parliament. Noting that the process of formulating the draft legislative amendments appears to be going in the right direction, the Committee trusts that the legislative amendments requested in its previous observations will be fully reflected in the new legislation. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the draft Labour Code as soon as the final version of it is available.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide statistics on the number of workers covered by collective agreements in comparison with the total number of workers in the country. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the requested statistics on collective bargaining are now available and will be sent in its subsequent reports. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will provide these statistics together with its next report.

Zambia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008, which are being translated and will be examined in the framework of the next reporting cycle.

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been requesting the Government to take measures to bring the following provisions of the Industrial and Labour Relations Act (ILRA) into conformity with the Convention:

- section 2(e), which excludes from the scope of the Act, and therefore from the guarantees afforded by the Convention, workers in the prison service, judges, registrars of the court, magistrates and local court justices, and section 2(2), which accords the Minister discretionary power to exclude certain categories of workers from the scope of the Act;
- sections 18(1)(b) and 43(1)(a), under which a person, having been an officer of an employers' or workers' organization whose certificate of registration has been cancelled, may be disqualified from being an officer of a trade union if that person fails to satisfy the commissioner that she or he did not contribute to the circumstances leading to such cancellation;
- section 76, which establishes no time frame within which conciliation should end before a strike can take place;
- section 78(6)–(8), under which a strike can be discontinued if it is found by the court not to be “in the public interest”;
- section 78(1), under which, as interpreted by a decision of the Industrial Relations Court, either party may take an industrial dispute to court;
- section 107, which prohibits strikes in essential services, defined too broadly, and empowers the Minister to add other services to the list of essential services, in consultation with the Tripartite Consultative Labour Council; and
- section 107, which empowers a police officer to arrest, without any possibility of bail, a person who is believed to be striking in an essential service and which imposes a fine and up to six months' imprisonment.

In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the concerns of the Committee are being addressed through the review of the labour laws and that the Amendment Bills were pending before the Cabinet. It hopes that the envisaged amendments will take into account the comments that it has been making for many years and that they will be adopted in the near future following full and frank consultations with the social partners. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress achieved in this respect and hopes that the amendments to the Act will be in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments made by the Federation of Free Trade Unions of Zambia (FFTUZ) in a communication dated 16 June 2008 alleging that the new draft amending the Industrial and Labour Relations Act (Bill No. 6 of 2008) contains provisions, which, if adopted, would violate workers' rights under the Convention and which were drafted without any consultation with the social partners. The Committee emphasizes the importance that should be attached to full and frank consultation taking place on any questions or proposed legislation affecting trade union rights. A request with regard to the provisions of Bill No. 6 of 2008 is addressed directly to the Government.

Zimbabwe

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2003)

The Committee notes the discussion held on the application of the Convention by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2008 in the absence of the Government's delegation, despite it being duly accredited and registered before the Conference. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee had decided to mention the case of Zimbabwe in a special paragraph of its report, as well as to mention this case as a case of continued failure to implement the Convention.

While taking due note of the Government's latest report in reply to its previous comments, the Committee observes the decision taken by the Governing Body at its 303rd Session to constitute a Commission of Inquiry into the non-observance by Zimbabwe of Conventions Nos 87 and 98. In these circumstances, and in accordance with usual practice which suspends the functioning of the supervisory machinery during the period of operation of a Commission of Inquiry, the Committee will renew its supervision of the application of the Convention in Zimbabwe once the Commission has concluded its work.

Forced labour

Afghanistan

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee has noted the Government's report, as well as the comments on the application of the Convention made by the All Afghanistan Federation of Trade Unions (AAFTU), received with the report.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the following provisions of the Penal Code, under which prison sentences involving an obligation to perform labour may be imposed:

- (a) sections 184(3), 197(1)(a) and 240 concerning, inter alia, the publication and propagation of news, information, false or self-interested statements, biased or inciting propaganda concerning internal affairs of the country which reduces the prestige and standing of the State, or for the purpose of harming public interest and goods;
- (b) section 221(1), (4) and (5) concerning a person who creates, establishes, organizes or administers an organization under the name of a party, society, union or group with the aim of disturbing and nullifying one of the basic and accepted national values in the political, social, economic or cultural spheres of the State, or makes propaganda for its extension or attraction to it, by whatever means it may be, or who joins such an organization or establishes relations, himself or through someone else with such an organization or one of its branches.

While having noted the Government's earlier indication concerning the special status given to prisoners convicted under the abovementioned sections of the Penal Code, the Committee pointed out that the imposition of sanctions involving compulsory labour on these persons remains contrary to the Convention, which prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a means of political coercion or education or as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system.

The Committee also refers in this connection to paragraphs 154 and 163 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, where it observed that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. But sanctions involving compulsory labour fall within the scope of the Convention where they enforce a prohibition of the peaceful expression of views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system. A similar situation arises where certain political views are prohibited, subject to penalties involving compulsory labour, as a consequence of the prohibition of political parties or associations.

The Committee has noted the Government's intention to prepare and supply to the ILO a separate report related to the penal law provisions, as well as the Government's indications concerning the adoption of the new Prisons Law of 2005, which replaced the previous law of 1982, and the adoption in 2004 of the law related to the freedom of media. The Committee asks the Government to communicate copies of these laws with its next report and hopes that the abovementioned penal provisions will be re-examined in the light of the Convention with a view to ensuring that no sanctions involving forced or compulsory labour may be imposed as a punishment for holding or expressing political or ideological views and that the Government will indicate the measures taken to this end.

Austria

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

Article 1, paragraph 1, and Article 2, paragraphs 1 and 2(c) of the Convention. Prisoners hired to private enterprises. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to section 46, paragraph 3, of the Law on the execution of sentences, as amended by Act No. 799/1993, under which prisoners may be hired to enterprises of the private sector, which may use their labour in privately run workshops and workplaces both inside and outside prisons. The Committee recalled that compulsory work or service exacted from any person as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law is compatible with the Convention only if two conditions are met: namely, that the said work or service is carried out under the supervision and control of a public authority; and that the said person is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations. The Committee has always made it clear that the two conditions apply cumulatively, i.e. the fact that the prisoner remains at all times under the supervision and control of a public authority does not in itself dispense the Government from fulfilling the second condition, namely, that the person is not "hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations". The Committee asked the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure observance of the Convention, such as for example to provide that any prisoners working for private enterprises offer themselves voluntarily without being subjected to pressure or the menace of any penalty and, given their conditions of captive labour, subject to guarantees as to wages and other conditions of employment approximating a free employment relationship.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indications that, in national law and practice, contracts exist only between the prisons administration and private enterprises, while prisoners, who are under an obligation to perform prison labour, have no labour contract with either an enterprise or the prisons administration; however, conditions of work are to a large extent determined by law, violations of which can be the subject of complaints by prisoners. The Government reiterates in its 2006 report that private enterprise employees give only technical instructions to prisoners hired to them and exercise only "specialist supervision", but they do not have any disciplinary powers, which remain with the prisons administration. The Government argues that a private company does not thereby have any right of disposal of the prisoners, since supervision is carried out by the prison staff.

In this connection, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the explanations concerning the scope of the terms "hired to or placed at the disposal of" in paragraphs 56–58 and 109–111 of the Committee's General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour and observes that these terms cover not only situations where prisoners are "employed" by the private company or placed in a position of servitude in relation to the private company, but also situations where the companies do not have absolute discretion over the type of work they can request the prisoner to do, since they are limited by the rules set by the public authority. The Committee also refers to paragraph 106 of its 2007 General Survey, where it considered that the prohibition for prisoners to be placed at the disposal of private parties is absolute and not limited to work outside penitentiary establishments, but applies equally to workshops operated by private undertakings inside prisons.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that, in conformity with the first condition set out in Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention, the work is carried out "under the supervision and control of a public authority". However, as regards the second condition, namely, that the person "is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations", the Committee has already pointed out on numerous occasions that contracts for the hiring of prison labour to private enterprises in Austria correspond in all respects to what is expressly prohibited by Article 2(2)(c), namely, that a person is "hired to" a private company. It is in the very nature of such hiring agreements to include mutual obligations between the prisons administration and the private enterprise.

Referring to the explanations in paragraphs 59–60 and 114–120 of its 2007 General Survey referred to above, the Committee points out once again that work by prisoners for private companies can be held compatible with the explicit prohibition of the Convention only where the necessary safeguards exist to ensure that the prisoners concerned offer themselves voluntarily, without being subjected to pressure or the menace of any penalty, as required by Article 2(1) of the Convention. In such a situation, work of prisoners for private companies does not come under the scope of the Convention, since no compulsion is involved. The Committee has considered that, taking into account their captive circumstances, it is necessary to obtain prisoners' formal consent to work for private enterprises both inside and outside prisons. Further, since such consent is given in a context of lack of freedom with limited options, there should be indicators which authenticate this free and informed consent. The Committee recalls that the most reliable indicator of the voluntariness of labour is the work performed under conditions approximating a free labour relationship, which include wage levels (leaving room for deductions and attachments), social security and occupational safety and health. In addition, there may be also other factors that can be regarded as objective and measurable advantages which the prisoner gains from the actual performance of the work and which could be considered in determining whether consent was freely given and informed (such as the learning of new skills which could be deployed by prisoners when released; the offer of continuing the work of the same type upon their release; or the opportunity to work cooperatively in a controlled environment enabling them to develop team skills).

The Committee has noted the Government's indications in its 2006 and 2008 reports concerning the rise in the prisoners' wages in accordance with the rise in the wages index, as well as guarantees concerning the prisoners' working time, occupational safety and health and social security. It has also noted the Government's view concerning other factors that makes work in the prison system valuable from the prisoners' perspective, such as the learning of new vocational skills, enjoying social contacts within the penal institution, etc., which may contribute to their rehabilitation in society after release. However, as the Committee noted previously, under the Act on the execution of sentences, prisoners' consent is not required for work in private enterprise workshops inside prisons, but only for such work outside prison premises. In the absence of the consent requirement, the general scope of protective legislation, as well as other factors mentioned by the Government, cannot be regarded as indicators of a freely accepted employment relationship.

The Committee therefore reiterates its hope that the Government will at last take the necessary measures to grant prisoners working for private enterprises a legal status with rights and conditions of employment that are compatible with this basic human rights instrument. In particular, the Committee hopes that measures will be taken to ensure that free and informed consent is required for the work of prisoners in private enterprise workshops inside prison premises, so that such consent is free from the menace of any penalty and authenticated by the conditions of work approximating a free labour relationship, as well as by other objective and measurable factors referred to above.

Bahamas

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1976)

Article 1(c) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. For many years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the 1976 Merchant Shipping Act, under which various breaches of labour discipline are punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to work, under section 10 of the Prisons Act and rules 76 and 95 of the Prison Rules) and deserting seafarers from ships registered in another country may be forcibly conveyed on board the ship. The Committee has noted the Government's indications in its earlier reports that some amendments to the Merchant Shipping Act have been made. It notes, however, that under sections 129(b) and (c) and 131(a) and (b) of the updated text of the Merchant Shipping Act, which it has consulted on the Government's web site, penalties of imprisonment may still be imposed for breaches of discipline such as disobedience to lawful command, neglect of duty, desertion and absence without leave, and section 135 of the Act still provides for the forcible conveyance of deserting seafarers to ships registered in another country, where it appears to the minister that reciprocal arrangements will be made in that country.

The Committee recalls that Article 1(c) expressly prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline. As the Committee repeatedly pointed out, only acts which endanger the ship or the life or health of persons are excluded from the scope of the Convention (see e.g. paragraphs 179–181 of the Committee's 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour). The Committee therefore reiterates its hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken with a view to amending the above provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, either by repealing sanctions involving compulsory labour or by restricting their application to the situations where the ship or the life or health of persons are endangered (as is the case, e.g. in section 128 of the same Act). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Article 1(d). Punishment for having participated in strikes. Over a number of years, the Committee has been referring to section 73 of the 1970 Industrial Relations Act, as amended, under which the minister may refer a dispute in non-essential services to the tribunal for settlement, if he considers that a public interest so requires; the recourse to strike action in this situation is prohibited, violation being punishable with penalties of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour, as explained above) under sections 74(3) and 77(2)(a) of the same Act. The Committee has further noted that, according to section 76(1), a strike which, in the opinion of the minister, affects or threatens the public interest, might also be referred to the tribunal for settlement, failure to discontinue the participation in such a strike being punishable with imprisonment under section 76(2)(b).

The Committee previously noted the Government's indications in its earlier report that the proposed Trade Unions and Industrial Relations Bill had been tabled in the House of Assembly, and that it contained no provisions imposing sanctions of imprisonment for breach of the legislation, which may be punished only with fines. The Committee also noted the Government's repeated statement that the above provisions of the Industrial Relations Act had never been applied in practice, and that the legislation would be amended when a consensus is achieved after further consultation with the social partners.

While having noted these indications, the Committee reiterates the firm hope that the review of the Act announced by the Government for a number of years will soon result in the amendment of the above provisions, so that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed for the mere fact of participating in a peaceful strike, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention. Referring also to its comments made in 2007 under Convention No. 87, likewise ratified by the Bahamas, the Committee asks the Government to supply a copy of the new legislation, as soon as it is adopted.

Bangladesh

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1972)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Restrictions on freedom of workers to terminate employment. Over a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, No. LIII of 1952, under which termination of employment by any person employed by the central Government, without the consent of the employer, is punishable with imprisonment for up to one year, notwithstanding any express or implied term in the contract of employment providing that the employee may freely terminate his or her employment with notice (sections 3, 5(1)(b) and Explanation 2, and section 7(1)). Pursuant to section 3 of the Act, these provisions apply to every employment under the central Government and to any employment or class of employment declared by the Government to be an essential service. The Committee also referred to the Essential Services (Second) Ordinance No. XLI, 1958, which contains similar provisions (sections 3, 4(a) and (b) and 5).

The Committee points out, once again, referring also to the explanations contained in paragraphs 96 and 97 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, that even regarding employment in essential services whose interruption would endanger the existence or well-being of the whole or part of the population, provisions depriving workers of the right to terminate their employment by giving notice of reasonable length are incompatible with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report that the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act No. LIII, 1952, has not yet been repealed, but has become redundant and its provisions are no longer applied in practice. As regards the Essential Services (Second) Ordinance, No. XLI of 1958, the Government indicates again that it is still in force and is not listed among the existing legislative texts to be repealed in the course of the labour legislation reform.

While noting the Government's repeated statement that it is in favour of the freedom of workers to terminate their employment by way of notice of reasonable length, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken to formally repeal the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act No. LIII, 1952, and to repeal or amend the Essential Services (Second) Ordinance No. XLI, 1958, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will soon be in a position to report the progress made in this regard.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25. Trafficking in persons. Law enforcement. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning various measures taken by different ministries, human rights organizations and law enforcement agencies to combat trafficking in persons for the purpose of exploitation, including awareness raising and prevention measures. The Government states that, due to these measures, and particularly due to the activities of law enforcement agencies, the problem has been considerably reduced. The Committee also notes statistical information concerning the number of investigations and convictions during the reporting period.

The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to provide information on the progress achieved in the implementation of the various action programmes against trafficking and will pursue its efforts to strengthen the law enforcement mechanism. Please continue to supply information on the number of trafficking offences reported, the number of prosecutions initiated and the number of convictions obtained, indicating the penalties imposed.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1972)

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. Penalties involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views, for breaches of labour discipline and for participating in strikes. For many years, the Committee has been referring to various provisions of the national legislation, under which penalties of imprisonment involving compulsory labour may be imposed as a punishment for expressing political views, for breaches of labour discipline and for participating in strikes in a wide range of circumstances. It referred in this connection to certain provisions of the Penal Code, the Special Powers Act (No. XIV of 1974), the Industrial Relations Ordinance (No. XXIII of 1969), the Control of Employment Ordinance (No. XXXII of 1965), the Post Office Act (No. VI of 1898), the Services (Temporary Powers) Ordinance (No. II of 1963) and the Merchant Shipping Ordinance (No. XXVI of 1983).

The Committee has noted the adoption of the Bangladesh Labour Act, 2006, which repealed and replaced the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969. However, the Committee notes with regret that the new Act does not contain any improvements as compared to the previous legislation in regard to the matters falling within the scope of the Convention. Thus, the Labour Act, 2006, still provides for certain restrictions on the right to strike, enforceable with sanctions of imprisonment involving compulsory labour, which is incompatible with the Convention. Regarding the Committee's earlier comments on the Penal Code and the Special Powers Act, 1974, the Committee previously noted the Government's repeated indications that the National Labour Law Commission had been examining the existing laws with a view to preparing recommendations to the Government regarding their amendment. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken in order to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention and that the Government will soon be in a position to report the progress made in this regard.

Article 1(c). Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to sections 198 and 199 of the Merchant Shipping Ordinance (No. XXVI of 1983), which provide for the forcible conveyance of seafarers on board ship to perform their duties, and sections 196, 197 and 200(iii), (iv), (v) and (vi) of the same Ordinance, which provide for penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour) for various disciplinary offences.

The Committee recalls that Article 1(c) of the Convention prohibits the exaction of forced or compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline and points out that only sanctions relating to acts tending to endanger the ship or the life or health of persons are not covered by the Convention. The Committee reiterates the firm hope, referring to the explanations provided in paragraphs 179–180 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, that sanctions of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) in the Merchant Shipping Ordinance will be either repealed or restricted to offences that endanger the safety of the ship or the life or health of persons, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention on this point. The Committee asks the Government to indicate, in its next report, the measures taken or envisaged to that effect.

The Committee is also addressing a more detailed request on the above points directly to the Government.

Belize

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Penalties involving compulsory labour as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline or for having participated in strikes. In comments made for a number of years, the Committee has referred to section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act, under which a penalty of imprisonment (involving, by virtue of section 66 of the Prison Rules, an obligation to perform labour) may be imposed on any person employed by the Government, municipal authority or any employer in charge of supplying electricity, water, railway, health, sanitary or medical services or communications or any other service that may by proclamation be declared by the Governor to be a public service, if such person wilfully and maliciously breaks a contract of service, knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that the probable consequences will be to cause injury or danger or grave inconvenience to the community. The Committee has also noted that section 2 of the Settlement of Disputes (Essential Services) Act, Statutory Instrument No. 92 of 1981, declared the national fire service, postal service, monetary and financial services (banks, treasury, monetary authority), airports (civil aviation and airport security services) and the port authority (pilots and security services) to be essential services; and Statutory Instrument No. 51 of 1988 declared the Social Security Scheme administered by the Social Security Branch an essential service.

The Committee pointed out that the imposition of sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline or for having participated in strikes is incompatible with the Convention. It noted that section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act refers not only to injury or danger but, alternatively, to grave inconvenience to the community, and applies not only to essential services in the strict sense of the term (that is, services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population), but also to other services, such as most employment under the Government or a municipal authority and most banking, postal and transport services.

The Committee has noted from the Government's latest report that section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act has not been amended. While having noted the Government's repeated indication in its earlier reports that there had been no recorded penalties of imprisonment imposed under this section, the Committee expresses firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken to bring section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice, and that the Government will soon be in a position to report the progress achieved in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Burundi

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee takes note of the communication dated 30 August 2008 received from the Confederation of Trade Unions of Burundi (COSYBU), which was sent to the Government on 22 September 2008. The Committee asks the Government to provide information in this regard in its next report.

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Compulsory community development work. Compulsory agricultural work. Compulsory labour resulting from a sentence handed down for the offences of begging and vagrancy. For many years, the Committee has drawn the Government's attention to the need to take measures to bring certain provisions of the national legislation into line with the Convention. The Committee notes from the information provided by the Government in its report that the provisions in question still appear to be in force.

With regard to Legislative Decree No. 1/16 of 29 May 1979, which establishes the obligation, under penalty of sanctions (one month of penal labour performed on one half-day a week), to perform community development work, the Committee notes that, according to the Government, Act No. 1/016 of 20 April 2005 organizing municipal administration, provides for voluntary participation in municipal development activities within the framework of national reconstruction. The Committee does not, however, note any provision to this effect in the version of the text annexed to the Government's report. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, according to the Government, the Legislative Decree of 29 May 1979 has been repealed. The Committee notes, however, that Act No. 1/016 of 20 April 2005 does not expressly repeal the abovementioned Legislative Decree. The Committee would therefore be grateful if the Government would indicate, firstly, whether Act No. 1/016 of 20 April 2005 was amended following its promulgation in the sense indicated by the Government and, secondly, the provisions which expressly repeal Legislative Decree No. 1/16 of 29 May 1979.

The Committee recalls that its previous comments referred to the following matters:

- the need to set out in the legislation the voluntary nature of agricultural work resulting from obligations relating to the conservation and utilization of the land and the obligation to create and maintain minimum areas of food crops (Ordinances Nos 710/275 and 710/276 of 25 October 1979);
- the need to repeal formally certain texts on compulsory cultivation, portage and public works (Decree of 14 July 1952, Ordinance No. 1286 of 10 July 1953, and Decree of 10 May 1957);
- the need to amend sections 340 and 341 of the Penal Code, pursuant to which, in the event of begging or vagrancy, a person may be placed at the disposal of the Government for a period of between one and five years, during which time he may be forced to perform work in a prison institution.

Recalling the Government's statement, according to which the national legislation considered contrary to the Convention and dealing with matters covered by the Ministry responsible for agriculture was to be submitted for repeal at one of the subsequent meetings of the Council of Ministers, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will make every effort to take concrete measures to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention in the very near future.

The Committee is also addressing a request directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Central African Republic

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

Article 1, paragraph 1, and Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Idleness, active population and compulsory activities. For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to formally repeal certain provisions of the national legislation which are contrary to the Convention inasmuch as they constitute a direct or indirect compulsion to work:

- Ordinance No. 66/004 of 8 January 1966 with respect to the suppression of idleness, as amended by Ordinance No. 72/083 of 18 October 1972, under which any able-bodied person aged between 18 and 55 years who cannot prove that she or he is engaged in a normal activity providing for her or his subsistence or that she or he is engaged in studies is considered to be idle and liable to a penalty of between one and three years of imprisonment;
- Ordinance No. 66/038 of June 1966 respecting the supervision of the active population, under which any person aged between 18 and 55 years who cannot justify belonging to one of the eight categories of the active population shall be called up to cultivate land designated by the administrative authorities and shall also be considered a vagabond if apprehended outside her or his sous-préfecture of origin and shall be liable to a sentence of imprisonment;
- Ordinance No. 75/005 of 5 January 1975 obliging all citizens to provide proof of the exercise of a commercial, agricultural or pastoral activity and making persons in violation of this provision liable to the most severe penalties; and
- section 28 of Act No. 60/109 of 27 June 1960 with respect to the development of the rural economy, under which minimum surfaces for cultivation are to be established for each rural community.

In its latest report, the Government indicates that it has decided to hold an inter-ministerial meeting with a view to sensitizing the ministers who initiated these texts about the necessity of repealing them. For practical reasons, this meeting could not be organized; nevertheless, the Labour Administration would spare no effort to bring about the repeal of the aforementioned texts. The Committee takes note of this information. This matter has been the subject of its comments for many years and the Committee expresses the firm hope that the inter-ministerial meeting to which the Government refers will very soon be held, and that it will lead to concrete proposals for the repeal of these texts, which are contrary to the Convention and which, although having fallen into disuse, remain in the national legislative scheme.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1964)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Imposition of imprisonment involving an obligation to work as a sanction for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social and economic system.

1. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that the Convention prohibits to impose sanctions involving an obligation to perform labour, including compulsory prison labour, on persons who, without having recourse to violence, hold or express political views, or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. Considering that section 62 of Order No. 2772, of 18 August 1955, regulating the functioning of penal institutions and the work of detainees, provides for the obligation to work in prison, prison sentences imposed on persons who express certain political opinions or their opposition to the established system will have an impact on the application of the Convention.

In this context, the Committee has been drawing for many years the Government's attention to the need to amend or repeal the provisions of Act No. 60/169 of 12 December 1960 (dissemination of prohibited publications liable to prejudice the development of the Central African nation) and Order No. 3-MI of 25 April 1969 (dissemination of periodicals or news of foreign origin not approved by the censorship authority), which provide for sentences of imprisonment that involve compulsory labour. The Committee notes that, according to the concluding observations of the United Nations Human Rights Committee on the Application of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights by Central African Republic, Order No. 05.002 of 22 February 2005, promulgating the Freedom of the Press and Communication (Organization) Act, is likely to decriminalize press offences. The Committee notes that the "Committee nevertheless observes with concern that many journalists have been subjected to pressure, intimidation or acts of aggression, and even imprisonment" (Document CCPR/C/CAF/CO/2 of 27 July 2006). The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of Order No. 05.002 promulgating the Freedom of the Press and Communication (Organization) Act and to indicate whether this new legislation has repealed Act No. 60/169 of 12 December 1960 and Order No. 3-MI of 25 April 1969. If not, please indicate the progress made in the process of repealing of these texts, to which the Government has been referring for a long time. Finally, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the legal provisions under which journalists have been imprisoned and the charges.

2. In order to ascertain that no sentences involving the obligation to work are imposed on persons who, without having recourse to violence, express political opinions or views opposed to the established political, social or economic system, the Committee needs to be able to assess the scope of the provisions mentioned below and to this end it would be grateful if the Government would provide copies of any court decisions handed down under these provisions.

- (i) Section 77 of the Penal Code (dissemination of propaganda for certain purposes; acts jeopardizing public safety, etc.) and sections 130–135 and 137–139 of the Penal Code (offences against persons occupying various public offices), which provide for prison sentences involving the obligation to work.
- (ii) Section 3 of Act No. 61/233 governing associations in the Central African Republic read in conjunction with section 12. Under section 12, the “founders, directors, administrators or members of any association that is unlawfully maintained or reconstituted after the act of dissolution” shall be liable to imprisonment. Under section 3 of this Act, any association which is “of such a nature as to give rise to political disturbances or cast discredit on political institutions and their functioning” shall be null and void.s

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention. Work in the general interest imposed in the context of compulsory military service. The Committee notes Ordinance No. 001/PCE/CEDNACVG/91 reorganizing the armed forces, a copy of which was provided by the Government. It notes that military service is compulsory for every citizen of Chad. Under section 14 of the Ordinance, conscripts who are fit for service are classified into two categories: the first, the size of which is determined each year by decree, is incorporated and compelled to perform active service; the second remains at the disposal of the military authorities for two years and may be called up to perform work in the general interest by order of the Government. The Committee notes that similar provisions were contained in Ordinance No. 2 of 1961 on the organization and recruitment of the armed forces of the Republic, on which it commented for many years. Indeed, these provisions are not compatible with Article 2, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention, under which, to be excluded from the scope of the Convention, any work or service exacted in virtue of compulsory military service laws must be of a purely military character. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to bring the provisions of section 14 of the Ordinance of 1991 reorganizing the armed forces and, as appropriate, any decrees issued thereunder, into conformity with the Convention.

Article 2, paragraph 2(c). For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government’s attention to the need to amend or repeal section 2 of Act No. 14 of 13 November 1959 authorizing the Government to take administrative measures for the relocation, internment or expulsion of persons whose activities constitute a danger for public order and security, under which persons convicted of penal offences involving prohibition of residence may be used for work in the public interest for a period, the duration of which is to be determined by order of the Prime Minister. This provision would allow the administrative authorities to impose work on persons subject to a prohibition of residence once they have completed their sentence. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information in this respect in its last report and that this provision is still in force. It hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures without further delay to amend or repeal section 2 of Act No. 14 of 13 November 1959 referred to above.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Congo

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report received in January 2008 contains no reply to its previous comments, and that the earlier reports due for 2007, 2006 and 2005 were not received. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it drew attention to the need to amend or repeal a number of texts that were inconsistent with the Convention – some of which were fairly old and were deemed by the Government to be obsolete. The Committee reminds the Government that it may call on the Office for technical assistance, and trusts that in its next report the Government will be in a position to inform that specific measures have been taken in response to the comments the Committee has been making for many years.

Article 2, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention. 1. Work exacted under compulsory military service laws. The Committee has on several occasions stressed the need to amend Act No. 16 of 27 August 1981 establishing compulsory military service. According to section 1 of the Act, national service is instituted for the purpose of enabling every citizen to participate in the defence and construction of the nation and has two components: military service and civic service. The Committee drew the Government’s attention to the fact that work exacted from recruits as part of compulsory national service, including work related to national development, is not purely military in nature and is therefore contrary to Article 2, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention. Noting the Government’s earlier statement that the practice of imposing on recruits work which is not purely military in nature has fallen into disuse and that it intended to repeal Act No. 16 of 1981 on compulsory national service, the Committee trusts that the necessary steps will be taken very shortly to amend or repeal this Act so as to bring the legislation into line with the Convention.

2. Youth brigades and workshops. The Committee observes that the Government has never provided information on the practical effect given to Act No. 31-80 of 16 December 1980 on guidance for youth under which the party and mass organizations were gradually to create all the conditions for the formation of youth brigades and the organization of youth workshops (type of tasks performed, number of persons involved, duration and conditions of their participation, etc.). However, the Government did indicate earlier that since 1991 such practices had fallen into disuse. The Committee points out that this Act has never been formally repealed and asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to repeal it.

Article 2, paragraph 2(d). Requisitioning of persons to perform community work in instances other than emergencies. In the comments it has been making for very many years, the Committee has pointed out that Act No. 24-60 of 11 May 1960 is inconsistent with the Convention in that it allows the requisitioning of persons to perform community work in instances other than the emergencies provided for under Article 2, paragraph 2(d), of the Convention, and provides that persons requisitioned who refuse to work are liable to a penalty of imprisonment of from one month to one year. The Committee notes the Government's earlier statement that this Act has fallen into disuse, and once again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to have it repealed formally so as to avoid any uncertainty in law.

The Committee raises other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Cyprus

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

Referring to its earlier comments, as well as to comments addressed to the Government under Convention No. 87, likewise ratified by Cyprus, the Committee notes with satisfaction that sections 79A and 79B of the Defence Regulations, which granted the Council of Ministers discretionary power to prohibit strikes in the services considered to be essential and to impose restrictions to terminate employment in such services, subject to penalties of imprisonment involving compulsory labour, were repealed by Order No. 366/2006 published in the Official Gazette on 22 September 2006.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which reads as follows:

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. 1. Work exacted for national development purposes. For several years the Committee has been requesting the Government to repeal Act No. 76-011 of 21 May 1976 concerning national development efforts and its Implementing Order No. 00748/BCE/AGRI/76 of 11 June 1976 concerning the performance of civic tasks in the context of the national food production programme. These legal texts, which aim to increase productivity in all sectors of national life, are contrary to the Convention inasmuch as they require, on pain of penal sanctions, every able-bodied adult person who is not already considered to be making his contribution by reason of his employment to carry out agricultural and other development work as decided by the Government. The legal texts also deem certain persons to be making their contribution, namely political representatives, wage earners and apprentices, public servants, tradesmen, members of the liberal professions, the clergy, students and pupils. The Committee notes that, in its latest report, the Government reiterates its previous declarations to the effect that these texts have lapsed and therefore, in effect, have been repealed. The Committee stresses the importance of formally repealing texts which are contrary to the Convention, out of a concern for legal finality. It again expresses the hope that the Government will soon be in a position to communicate information on the measures taken to repeal or amend the abovementioned texts so as to ensure their conformity with the Convention in fact as well as in law.

2. Work exacted as a means of levying taxes. In its previous comments the Committee drew the Government's attention to sections 18 to 21 of Legislative Ordinance No. 71/087 of 14 September 1971 on minimum personal contributions, which provide for imprisonment involving compulsory labour, upon decision of the chief of the local community or the area commissioner, of taxpayers who have defaulted on their minimum personal contributions. The Committee notes that, contrary to the information provided in its previous reports, according to which draft amendments to the provisions in question were under consideration, the Government, in its latest report, indicates that these provisions have lapsed and have therefore been effectively repealed. Recalling that this matter has been the subject of its comments for many years, the Committee again expresses the firm hope that the Government will shortly adopt the necessary measures to ensure the conformity of the legislation with the Convention.

Article 2(2)(c). Work exacted from detainees in preventive detention. For many years the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to Ordinance No. 15/APAJ of 20 January 1938 concerning the prison system in indigenous districts, which allows work to be exacted from detainees who have not been convicted. The Government stated that, under section 64.3 of the Ordinance of 1965 governing prison labour, detainees who have not been convicted are not subject to the obligation to work. The Committee notes that in its latest report, the Government again indicates that Ordinance No. 15/APAJ has lapsed and therefore has, in effect, been repealed. It again expresses the hope that the next time the legislation in this field is revised, the Government will adopt the necessary measures to repeal formally Ordinance No. 15/APAJ, so as to avoid any legal ambiguity.

Article 25. Penal sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee stressed the need to include a provision in national legislation establishing penal sanctions for persons who unlawfully exact forced or compulsory labour, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention. It noted that, under section 323 of the Labour Code adopted in 2002, any infringement of section 2.3, which prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour, shall be punished by a maximum of six months' penal servitude plus a fine or by only one of these penalties, without prejudice to criminal legislation laying down more severe penalties. In this regard, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government would indicate the penal provisions which prohibit and sanction recourse to forced labour. Since the Government has not replied to its previous observation on this matter, the Committee would be grateful if it would provide the requested information in its next report. Furthermore, it once again requests the Government to send an updated copy of the Penal Code and of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

In addition, the Committee addresses a request directly to the Government concerning other points.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Dominica

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which reads as follows:

Article 1(1) and Article 2(1) and (2)(a) and (d), of the Convention. National service obligations. In its earlier comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures with a view to repeal or amend the National Service Act, 1977, under which persons between the ages of 18 and 21 years are required to perform service with the national service, including participation in development and self-help projects concerning housing, school, construction, agriculture and road building, failure to do so being punishable with a fine and imprisonment (section 35(2)). The Committee observed that, contrary to the Government's repeated statement that the national service was created to respond to national disasters, the Act contained no reference to natural disasters, but specified the objectives of the national service, which "shall be to mobilize the energies of the people of Dominica to the fullest possible level of efficiency, to shape and direct those energies to promoting the growth and economic development of the State". The Committee also referred to Article 1(b) of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), likewise ratified by Dominica, which specifically prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour "as a means of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development".

While noting the Government's previous indication that the National Service Act, 1977, has been omitted from the Revised Laws of Dominica, 1990, as well as the Government's repeated indications in its previous reports that section 35(2) of the Act has not been applied in practice, the Committee expresses firm hope that appropriate measures will be taken in the near future in order to formally repeal the above Act so as to bring national legislation into conformity with Conventions Nos 29 and 105 and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee is also addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Egypt

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1955)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Use of conscripts for non-military purposes. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to Act No. 76 of 1973, as amended by Act No. 98 of 1975, concerning general (civic) service of young persons on completion of their studies. According to section 1 of the Act, young persons, male and female, who have completed their studies and who are surplus to the requirements of the armed forces, may be directed to work, such as development of rural and urban societies, agricultural and consumers' cooperative associations and work in production units of factories. The Committee recalled that the Conference, while adopting the Special Youth Schemes Recommendation, 1970 (No. 136), had rejected the practice of making young people participate in development activities as part of their compulsory military service, or instead of it, as being incompatible both with the present Convention and Convention No. 105, which provides for the abolition of any form of compulsory labour as a means of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication concerning a proposal submitted to the Committee on Law Revision at the Ministry of Social Solidarity to amend the Act on general (civic) service of young persons referred to above, so as to provide for the voluntary nature of the service. The Government indicates in its latest report that the amendment of the Act is still under discussion. It also reiterates that, as regards the application of the current legislation, civic service continues to be of a voluntary nature and no application for exemption from such service submitted by any person has been refused.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Act concerning general (civic) service of young persons will soon be amended by clearly providing that the participation of young people in the civic service programme is voluntary, in order to ensure the observance of the forced labour Conventions. Pending the amendment, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of the above legislation in practice, including information on the number of persons who applied for exemption from such service and those whose applications have been refused.

The Committee is again addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1958)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views opposed to the established system. For many years, the Committee has been referring to the following provisions of the Penal Code, the Public Meetings Act of 1923, the Meetings Act of 1914 and Act No. 40 of 1977 respecting political parties, which provide for penal sanctions involving compulsory labour in circumstances falling within the scope of Article 1(a) of the Convention:

- (a) section 98(a)bis and 98(d) of the Penal Code, as amended by Act No. 34 of 24 May 1970, which prohibit the following: advocacy, by any means, of opposition to the fundamental principles of the socialist system of the State, encouraging aversion or contempt for these principles, encouraging calls to oppose the union of the people's

- working forces, constituting or participating in any association or group pursuing any of the foregoing aims, or receiving any material assistance for the pursuit of such aims;
- (b) sections 98(b), 98(b)bis and 174 of the Penal Code (concerning advocacy of certain doctrines);
 - (c) the Public Meetings Act, 1923, and the Meetings Act, 1914, granting general powers to prohibit or dissolve meetings, even in private places;
 - (d) sections 4 and 26 of Act No. 40 of 1977 respecting political parties, which prohibit the creation of political parties whose objectives are in conflict with Islamic legislation or with the achievements of socialism, or which are branches of foreign parties.

The Committee points out once again, referring also to the explanations provided in paragraphs 152–166 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, that the abovementioned provisions are contrary to the Convention in so far as they provide for sanctions involving compulsory prison labour for expressing certain political views or views ideologically opposed to the established system, or for having infringed a discretionary decision by the administrative authorities depriving people of the right to make public their opinions or suspending or dissolving certain associations.

The Committee has taken due note of the adoption of Act No. 95 of 2003, to which the Government refers in its 2006 report in reply to the Committee's earlier comments. It has noted that section 2 of the Act has abolished the penalty of hard labour in the Penal Code or any other penal text, and replaced it with the penalty of "aggravated imprisonment" (as distinct from "simple imprisonment"), which involves an obligation to work. The Committee refers in this connection to the explanations in paragraph 147 of the above General Survey, in which it pointed out that the scope of the Convention is not restricted to sentences of "hard labour" or other particularly arduous forms of labour, as distinct from ordinary prison labour. The Convention makes no distinction between "hard labour" and compulsory labour exacted from people as a result of any other type of sentence and prohibits the use of "any form" of forced or compulsory labour as a sanction, as a means of coercion, education or discipline, or as a punishment in respect of the persons within the ambit of Article 1(a), (c) and (d).

The Committee also draws the Government's attention to the explanations contained in paragraphs 154, 162 and 163 of the above General Survey, where it observed that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. But sanctions involving compulsory labour fall within the scope of the Convention where they enforce a prohibition of peaceful expression of views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system, whether such prohibition is imposed by law or by a discretionary administrative decision. Since opinions and views ideologically opposed to the established system are often expressed at various kinds of meetings, if such meetings are subject to prior authorization granted at the discretion of the authorities and violations can be punished by sanctions involving compulsory labour, they also come within the scope of the Convention.

The Committee has observed that the scope of the provisions referred to above is not limited to acts of violence or incitement to the use of violence, armed resistance or an uprising, but appears to provide for the punishment of the peaceful expression of non-violent views that are critical of government policy and the established political system, with penalties involving compulsory labour. The Committee therefore reiterates the firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken to bring the above provisions into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will report on the action taken to this end. Pending the amendment of the legislation, the Committee again requests the Government to provide full information on their application in practice, supplying sample copies of the relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

Article 1(b). Use of conscripts for purposes of economic development. The Committee refers in this connection to its observation addressed to the Government under Convention No. 29, likewise ratified by Egypt.

Article 1(d). Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for participation in strikes. In comments it has been making for many years, the Committee referred to sections 124, 124A, 124C and 374 of the Penal Code, under which strikes by any public employees may be punished with imprisonment, which may involve compulsory labour. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the observance of Article 1(d) of the Convention, which prohibits the use of compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes.

The Committee has noted the Government's repeated indications in its reports that terms of imprisonment under the above sections of the Penal Code vary from six months to one year, which means that the imprisonment in question is "simple imprisonment" which involves no obligation to perform labour. However, the Committee previously noted that section 124 refers to imprisonment for a period of up to one year, which may be doubled in certain cases; the maximum penalty is two years under section 124A; sections 124 and 124A apply in conjunction with sections 124C and 374 of the Code. The Committee also noted previously that under sections 19 and 20 of the Penal Code, imprisonment with labour is imposed in all cases where persons are sentenced to imprisonment for one year or more. It follows from the provision of section 20 that the judge will pass a sentence of imprisonment with labour already when the term of imprisonment is one year, which is the maximum term under section 124, paragraph 1. As regards the provision of section 124, paragraph 2, concerning a possibility to double the term of imprisonment, this provision is applicable in certain cases defined in terms large enough to raise questions about their compatibility with the Convention: when such work stoppages create disorder among the people or are prejudicial to the public interest.

The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that appropriate measures will be taken in this connection to ensure the observance of the Convention, so that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed for the mere fact of participating in a peaceful strike. Having also noted the Government's indication in its previous report that no court decisions have been issued yet under the abovementioned sections of the Penal Code, the Committee hopes that, pending the amendment of the legislation, the Government will supply copies of such court decisions, if and when they are handed down.

Article 1(c) and (d). Sanctions involving compulsory labour applicable to seafarers. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to sections 13(5) and 14 of the Maintenance of Security, Order and Discipline (Merchant Navy) Act, 1960, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed on seafarers who together commit repeated acts of insubordination. The Committee recalled in this connection that Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention prohibits the exaction of forced or compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline or as punishment for having participated in strikes. The Committee observed that, in order to remain outside the scope of the Convention, punishment should be linked to acts that endanger or are likely to endanger the safety of the vessel or the life or health of persons.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that the above Act was being amended. Since the Government's latest report contains no new information on this matter, the Committee reiterates its hope that, in the course of the revision, the abovementioned provisions of the 1960 Act will be brought into conformity with the Convention and that the Government will supply a copy of the amended text, as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee is also addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

El Salvador

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1995)

Articles 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons and penalties. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to provide information about pending prosecutions as well as copies of any existing court rulings on the application of national legislation (sections 367 and 370 of the Penal Code) that penalizes trafficking in persons.

The Committee notes with interest the information provided by the Government in its report, according to which 11 sentences of from three to nine years' imprisonment were imposed during the period from October 2006 to March 2008. The Government indicated that the text of the court judgements in these cases could not be supplied until the Supreme Court of Justice ruled on the appeals that were pending before it. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide a copy of the rulings mentioned as soon as possible, and that it will continue to inform about sanctions imposed on those responsible for the crime of trafficking in persons.

The Committee also notes with interest the adoption of the Strategic Plan 2008–12 of the National Committee against Trafficking in Persons, developed with assistance from the International Organization for Migration and the International Labour Organization, which has the objective of creating conditions and instruments that can contribute to the eradication of trafficking in persons. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information about the actions undertaken in the different areas of the Strategic Plan, namely the legal framework, caring for victims, prevention, communication and sensitization.

Germany

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1956)

Article 1(1) and Article 2(1) and (2)(c), of the Convention. Work of prisoners for private enterprises. In comments made for many years on law and practice in Germany, the Committee referred to the situation of prisoners working for private enterprises. It noted, in particular, that such prisoners fall into two categories: (a) prisoners performing work on the basis of a free employment relationship outside penitentiary institutions; and (b) prisoners who are obliged to work, without their consent, in workshops run by private enterprises within state prisons, in conditions bearing no resemblance whatsoever to the free labour market. The Committee pointed out that the latter situation is incompatible with Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention, which expressly prohibits convicted prisoners from being hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations. It also noted with regret that the requirement of the prisoner's formal consent to be employed in a workshop run by a private enterprise, laid down in section 41(3) of the Act on the execution of sentences of 1976, was suspended by the Second Act to improve the budget structure, of 22 December 1981, and had remained a dead letter since that time.

The Committee has noted the Government's indication in its 2006 and 2008 reports that, when work is carried out for private companies in prisons, only the material for the work is brought into the prisons by the companies, the supervision of the prisoners concerned being the sole responsibility of the prison staff. The Committee recalls in this connection that compulsory work or service exacted from any person as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law is compatible with the Convention only if two conditions are met: namely, that the said work or service is carried out under the supervision and control of a public authority and that the said person is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations. The fact that prisoners remain at all times under the authority and control of the prison administration does not detract from the fact that they are “hired to” a private enterprise – a practice designated in Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention as being incompatible with this basic human rights instrument.

Referring to the explanations in paragraphs 59–60 and 114–120 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee points out once again that work by prisoners for private companies can be held compatible with the explicit prohibition of the Convention only where the necessary safeguards exist to ensure that the prisoners concerned offer themselves voluntarily, without being subjected to pressure or the menace of any penalty, as required by Article 2(1) of the Convention. In such a situation, work of prisoners for private companies does not come under the scope of the Convention, since no compulsion is involved. The Committee has considered that, taking into account their captive circumstances, it is necessary to obtain prisoners’ formal consent to work for private enterprises both inside and outside prisons. Further, since such consent is given in a context of lack of freedom with limited options, there should be indicators which authenticate this free and informed consent. The Committee recalls that the most reliable indicator of the voluntariness of labour is the work performed under conditions approximating a free labour relationship, which include wage levels (leaving room for deductions and attachments), social security and occupational safety and health. In addition, there may be also other factors that can be regarded as objective and measurable advantages which the prisoner gains from the actual performance of the work and which could be considered in determining whether consent was freely given and informed (such as the learning of new skills which could be deployed by prisoners when released; the offer of continuing the work of the same type upon their release; or the opportunity to work cooperatively in a controlled environment enabling them to develop team skills).

The Committee notes with regret the Government’s statement in its 2006 and 2008 reports that, in view of the overall economic situation in Germany, the federal Government has still not taken any steps to bring into force a provision for the consent of prisoners to work in private workshops, as laid down in section 41(3) of the Act on the execution of sentences of 1976, or any steps to raise prisoners’ remuneration or include them in the pension insurance scheme.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its latest report that, throughout the federal territory, an average of 11.61 per cent of prisoners worked for private enterprises in 2006, though figures for the Länder ranged from 2 up to 20 per cent. The Government states that the work situation in prisons is characterized by a job shortage, and the prison authorities are therefore striving to increase the percentage of private companies in prisons to bring down the number of unemployed. As regards the wages earned by prisoners working in private workshops, the Committee previously noted the Government’s view that the existing level of prisoners’ remuneration in Germany was still insufficient and that, in spite of the Federal Constitutional Court’s decision of 24 March 2002, which currently precludes the success of any policy initiatives aimed at further increasing prisoners’ remuneration, the Government would nevertheless continue to promote its view and monitor closely the budgetary situation in the Länder. The Government also expressed its intention to pursue its efforts as regards the inclusion of prisoners in the state pension schemes. As regards conditions of work of prisoners working for private enterprises, the Committee has noted from the Government’s reports that their hours of work generally correspond to the regular weekly working hours in the public service, and the statutory safety and health and accident prevention provisions are also fully applied.

While having duly noted this information, the Committee reiterates its concern that, more than 50 years after the ratification of this fundamental human rights Convention, a significant proportion of the prisoners working for private enterprises in Germany is hired to private enterprises which use their labour without their consent and in conditions bearing no resemblance whatsoever to the free labour market. While noting the Government’s repeated statement in its reports that the Federal Constitutional Court has ruled that compulsory work of prisoners for private companies is compatible with the Basic Law, the Committee points out once again that, as explained above, the situation is still not in conformity with the Convention, both in legislation and in practice.

Noting the Government’s view expressed in its reports that the work of prisoners for private companies should be adapted as closely as possible to normal working conditions – so as to facilitate the prisoners’ reinsertion into working life – the Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken, both at the federal and at the Länder levels, to ensure that free and informed consent is required for the work of prisoners in private enterprise workshops inside prison premises, so that such consent is free from the menace of any penalty and authenticated by the conditions of work approximating a free labour relationship, as well as by other objective and measurable factors referred to above. The Committee hopes, in particular, that the provision for the consent of prisoners to work in private workshops, already made in section 41(3) of the 1976 Act referred to above, will at last be brought into operation, together with the provisions regarding their contribution to the old-age pension scheme, as foreseen by section 191 et seq. of the same Act, and that the Government will soon be in a position to report the progress made in this regard.

Ghana

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. 1. In comments made for a considerable number of years, the Committee has referred to provisions of the Criminal Code, the Newspaper Licensing Decree, 1973, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1963, the Protection of Property (Trade Disputes) Ordinance and the Industrial Relations Act, 1965, under which imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) may be imposed as a punishment for non-observance of restrictions imposed by discretionary decision of the executive on the publication of newspapers and the carrying on of associations, for various breaches of discipline in the merchant marine and for participation in certain forms of strikes. Having requested the Government to adopt the necessary measures in regard to these provisions to ensure that no form of forced or compulsory labour (including compulsory prison labour) might be exacted in circumstances falling within Article 1(a), (c) or (d) of the Convention, the Committee noted the Government's statement that the National Advisory Committee on Labour was discussing the comments of the Committee of Experts and that it was the wish of the Government to bring the legislation concerned into conformity with the Convention. The Government also indicated in its report received in 1996 that the National Advisory Committee on Labour concluded discussions on the Committee of Experts' comments and submitted recommendations to the Minister in March 1994 designed to bring domestic legislation into conformity with ILO standards, and the comments of the Committee of Experts had been submitted to the Attorney-General for a closer study and expert comments.

In its reports received in 1999 and 2001, the Government has indicated that the action of the Attorney-General to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention in accordance with the recommendations of the National Advisory Committee on Labour has been halted in view of the proposed review and codification of the labour laws. It has also indicated that the tripartite National Forum that includes representatives of the Attorney-General's Office, the National Advisory Committee on Labour and the employers' and workers' organizations, would consider the comments made by the Committee of Experts regarding the application of the Convention.

The Government indicates in its latest report that the National Forum has already codified all the country's labour laws into a single labour bill, which is being considered by the Cabinet and will be forwarded to Parliament to be passed into law. The Committee expresses firm hope that the necessary action will at last be taken on the various points which are once again recalled in detail in a request addressed directly to the Government.

2. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Political Parties Law, 1992, the Emergency Powers Act, 1994, and the Public Order Act, 1994, which gave rise to a number of questions under the Convention that are also reiterated in the request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Guyana

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to observations concerning the application of the Convention by Guyana received from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) in 2003 and forwarded to the Government on 13 January 2004, which contained allegations that there was evidence of trafficking for forced prostitution and reports of child prostitution in cities and remote gold mining areas.

The Committee notes the adoption of the Combating of Trafficking in Persons Act, 2005, as well as the Government's indication in the report that 300 volunteers have been trained to identify cases of trafficking. The Committee would appreciate it if the Government would provide information on the following matters:

- the activities of the task force to develop and implement a national plan for the prevention of trafficking in persons, to which reference is made in section 30 of the above Act, supplying copies of any relevant reports, studies and inquiries, as well as a copy of the National Plan;
- statistical data on trafficking which is collected and published by the Ministry of Home Affairs in virtue of section 31 of the Act;
- any legal proceedings which have been instituted as a consequence of the application of section 3(1) of the 2005 Act on penalties, supplying copies of the relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed, as well as the information on measures taken to ensure that this provision is strictly enforced against perpetrators, as required by Article 25 of the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Hungary

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1956)

Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention. 1. Work of prisoners for private companies. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the national provisions allowing the law enforcement authorities to conclude agreements concerning the employment of prisoners not only with public bodies or institutions, but also with private companies (section 101(3) of Order No. 6/1996 (VII 12) of the Ministry of Justice on the implementation of provisions concerning prison sentences and detention). It noted that Law-Decree No. 11 of 1979 on the execution of prison sentences provides for an obligation of convicts to work (section 33(1)(d)). The Committee also noted that the employment-related rights of prisoners are governed by the general provisions of labour law (subject to certain deviations), but their minimum remuneration corresponds only to one third of the general minimum wage (section 124(2) of the above Order No. 6/1996 (VII 12)) and they do not acquire pension rights under the existing legislation.

The Committee noted the Government's repeated statement in its reports that prisoners are in a legal relationship with a penitentiary institution and are not directly employed by a third party, and perform labour under the supervision and control of the law enforcement bodies. It also noted the Government's statement that the principal goal of employing inmates is to promote their rehabilitation and reintegration into society, as well as the Government's view (also reiterated in its latest report) that the work performed by convicts (including the "public utility labour") is covered by the exception provided for in Article 2(2)(c) and therefore should not be considered as forced or compulsory labour.

The Committee recalled, however, that Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention expressly prohibits that convicted prisoners are hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations, in a sense that the exception from the scope of the Convention provided for in this Article for compulsory prison labour does not extend to work of prisoners for private companies, even under public supervision and control. Under this provision of the Convention, work or service exacted from any person as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law is excluded from the scope of the Convention only if two conditions are met, namely: (i) that the said work or service is carried out under the supervision and control of a public authority; and (ii) that the said person is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations. The Committee has always made it clear that the two conditions are applied cumulatively; i.e. the fact that the prisoner remains at all times under the supervision and control of a public authority does not in itself dispense the Government from fulfilling the second condition, namely that the person is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations. The Committee therefore asked the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure observance of the Convention, such as, e.g., to provide that any prisoners working for private companies offer themselves voluntarily without being subjected to pressure or the menace of any penalty and, given their conditions of captive labour, subject to guarantees as to wages and other conditions of employment approximating a free employment relationship.

The Government reiterates in its latest report that, in national law and practice, contracts exist only between the economic organizations of penal authorities and private companies, while prisoners, who are under an obligation to perform prison labour, are in relation solely with the economic organizations of penal authorities; however, general labour legislation is applicable with regard to their conditions of work (with certain differences). It follows from the sample contracts concluded between the economic organizations of penal authorities and private companies, supplied by the Government, that the economic organization of penal authorities is responsible for providing prison workforce for the production, which will be organized under the job description and instructions as well as regular quality control of the private company, which will also supply all the necessary raw materials and tools and provide training for the workers; the private company will also pay a rental fee for the premises provided for the production and the "fee for the leased work". It is specifically mentioned that the private company shall continuously control the production through its technical specialists, that the economic organization of penal authorities shall obey the instructions given by the private company, and that the contracting parties agree that they will cooperate during the term of the "lease work agreement". The Government reiterates, however, that prisoners remain at all times under the supervision and control of the staff of the economic organization of penal authorities, in accordance with the provisions of the Convention.

In this connection, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the explanations concerning the scope of the terms "hired to or placed at the disposal of" in paragraphs 56–58 and 109–111 of the Committee's 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour and observes that these terms cover not only situations where prisoners are "employed" by the private company or placed in a position of servitude in relation to the private company, but also situations where the companies do not have absolute discretion over the work performed by the prisoner, since they are limited by the rules set by the public authority. The Committee also refers to paragraph 106 of its 2007 General Survey, where it considered that the prohibition for prisoners to be placed at the disposal of private parties is absolute and not limited to work outside penitentiary establishments, but applies equally to workshops operated by private undertakings inside prisons.

While noting the Government's indication that, in conformity with the first condition set out in Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention, the work is carried out "under the supervision and control of a public authority", the Committee observes that, as regards the second condition, namely, that the person "is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations", contracts for the use of prison labour concluded with private companies in Hungary correspond in all respects to what is expressly prohibited by Article 2(2)(c), namely, that a person is "hired to" a private company. It is in the very nature of such hiring agreements (or "lease work agreements", as they are called in the sample contracts supplied by the Government) to include mutual obligations between the prison authorities (or their economic branches) and the private company.

Referring to the explanations in paragraphs 59–60 and 114–120 of its 2007 General Survey referred to above, the Committee points out once again that work by prisoners for private companies can be held compatible with the explicit prohibition of the Convention only where the necessary safeguards exist to ensure that the prisoners concerned offer themselves voluntarily, without being subjected to pressure or the menace of any penalty, as required by Article 2(1) of the Convention. In such a situation, work of prisoners for private companies does not come under the scope of the Convention, since no compulsion is involved. The Committee has considered that, taking into account their captive circumstances, it is necessary to obtain prisoners' formal consent to work for private enterprises both inside and outside prisons. Further, since such consent is given in a context of lack of freedom with limited options, there should be indicators which authenticate this free and informed consent. The Committee recalls that the most reliable indicator of the voluntariness of labour is the work performed under conditions approximating a free labour relationship, which include wage levels (leaving room for deductions and attachments), social security and occupational safety and health. In addition, there may also be other factors that can be regarded as objective and measurable advantages which the prisoner gains from the actual performance of the work and which could be considered in determining whether consent was freely given and informed (such as the learning of new skills which could be deployed by prisoners when released; the offer of continuing the work of the same type upon their release; or the opportunity to work cooperatively in a controlled environment enabling them to develop team skills).

Noting with interest the Government's indication in the report that, in the course of the preparation of the comprehensive amendment of Law-Decree No. 11 of 1979 on the execution of prison sentences, the provisions of the Convention are being taken into account, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken to ensure that free and informed consent is required for the work of prisoners for private companies both inside and outside prison premises, so that such consent is free from the menace of any penalty and authenticated by the conditions of work approximating a free labour relationship, as well as by other objective and measurable factors referred to above. The Committee requests the Government to supply a copy of the revised penitentiary legislation, as soon as it is adopted.

2. "Public utility labour" performed by convicted persons placed at the disposal of private parties. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Penal Code provisions concerning "public utility labour", which shall be performed, as a penal sanction, without deprivation of a person's freedom and without remuneration, but may be replaced by confinement in prison, if the convicted person fails to fulfil his or her labour obligations (sections 49 and 50 of the Penal Code). The Committee noted the Government's indications that the work to be performed as public utility labour must be of public interest and that the employer (which may not only be a public institution, but also a private business organization) shall observe the safety provisions and ensure the same working conditions as those enjoyed by workers employed on the basis of a contract.

The Committee notes the Government's indications concerning the National Strategy of Civil Crime Prevention and the adoption of Government decision No. 1036/2005 (IV.21) on tasks to be implemented in 2005–2006 in this connection, including the organization of special programmes for persons sentenced to public utility labour.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that convicted persons comply with their working obligations voluntarily and can choose freely between the two kinds of punishment. Referring to the above considerations in point 1 of the present observation concerning the prohibition contained in Article 2(2)(c), as well as to the explanations in paragraphs 123–128 in its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee hopes that the Government will indicate, in its next report, how free choice between the two kinds of punishment is guaranteed and whether, in the course of drafting the new penitentiary legislation, a requirement of the voluntary consent of convicts to work for a private employer is taken into account. Please also provide information on the practical implementation of special programmes for carrying out public utility labour referred to above, including a list of authorized associations or institutions using such labour and giving examples of the type of work involved.

Indonesia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1950)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. 1. Trafficking in persons. In its previous observation the Committee, noting the persistence of the practice of trafficking in persons in Indonesia, and the gravity and extent of the phenomenon, expressed the hope that the Government would provide detailed information concerning its efforts to combat this problem, particularly with regard to prevention and protection measures and to the punishment of perpetrators.

The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government in its report concerning the implementation of the National Plan of Action for the Elimination of Trafficking in Women and Children, and, in particular, the information on the prevention and protection measures, law enforcement, as well as intersector and intergovernmental coordination and cooperation. The Committee notes the "challenges" in relation to efforts in Indonesia to combat trafficking in persons, which the Government identified in its national report submitted in March 2008 to the Working Group on the Universal Periodic Review of the UN Human Rights Council (A/HRC/WG.6/1/IDN/1). The Committee hopes that the Government will provide more specific and detailed information about task forces required to be set up under section 58(2) and (3) of Law No. 21/2007 to implement policies, programmes, and activities to prevent trafficking in persons, particularly at the regional (provincial and district) and municipal levels of government, including information about their operation and functioning and the amount and adequacy of budgetary allocations they receive, and, in general, information about the attention being paid to the problem of trafficking at that level of government.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report on recent law enforcement efforts, including the references to judicial cases involving the arrest, prosecution and punishment of perpetrators. The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to provide information about the judicial proceedings instituted under Law No. 21/2007, as well as, more generally, information regarding the enforcement by police and judicial authorities of criminal provisions relating to trafficking in persons, including statistics about prosecutions, convictions and sentences imposed.

The Committee notes the reference in the Government's report to Decree No. 10 of July 2007 of the Chief of the Indonesian National Police, issued under section 45 of Law No. 21/2007 in relation to establishment of "special service rooms" in local police stations in every province and city to protect victims of trafficking and to examine witnesses in trafficking investigations. The Government also refers to Regulation No. 9/2008 promulgated under section 46(2) of Law No. 21/2007 on the establishment of "integrated service centers" in every city and regency to protect victims and witnesses in trafficking cases. The Committee also notes the reference to an undated multi-stakeholder initiative that entails disseminating information to and sensitizing prosecutors regarding Law No. 21/2007. The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to provide information about the operation and functioning of these special service units, particularly their use in criminal investigations and witness protection programmes, and that it will also supply copies of the provisions referred to above. The Committee repeats its request for information on the operation of the Witness and Victim Protection Institution (LPSK), including a copy of the annual report which the LPSK is required to submit to the House of Representatives under article 13(2) of Law No. 13/2006.

2. Vulnerable situation of Indonesian migrant workers with regard to the illegal exaction of forced labour. In its previous observation the Committee noted, inter alia, that Law No. 39/2004 on the placement and protection of Indonesian workers abroad does not appear to provide effective protection for migrant workers against the risks of exploitation due to its vague provisions and its numerous shortcomings and that, despite these and other measures adopted by the Government, many Indonesian workers continue to turn to illegal networks, thereby increasing the risk of exploitation. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide detailed information on tangible measures it is taking to improve the protection of Indonesian migrant workers against exploitation and the imposition of forced labour, both in Indonesia and following their departure abroad.

The Committee notes the references in the Government's report to the issuance of several legal provisions to implement Law No. 39/2004, including: Presidential Decree No. 81/2006 (and the establishment under that Decree of a coordinating body, the National Board for the Placement and Protection of Indonesian Overseas Workers (BNP2TKI)); Presidential Instruction No. 6/2006 on reform of the policy on the protection and placement of Indonesian workers abroad; and Decree No. 18/2007 of the Ministry of Manpower and Transmigration. The Government refers to several measures taken pursuant to Presidential Instruction No. 6/2006, including: the establishment of citizens' advisory services in six destination countries; allocations made under the state budget to "Indonesian Labour" to subsidize the printing of "overseas workers cards" and the costs of pre- and post-departure training programmes; and the establishment of "integrated service rooms" at airport gates. The Committee also notes the Government's reference to the increased number of Indonesian labour attachés assigned to destination countries.

The Committee notes that the measures noted above appear to place greater emphasis on addressing the shortcomings of worker placement and placement-related procedures than on worker protections. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will provide greater information about the protective aspects of the provisions noted above and about the measures being taken to implement them, and that it will also supply copies of those provisions. The Committee would be grateful for more specific information about the activities of the National Board for the Placement and Protection of Indonesian Overseas Workers as they relate to the protection of Indonesian migrant workers. Please also provide more detailed information about measures being taken or contemplated to protect Indonesian migrant workers by way of controlling the exploitative aspects of activities of private recruitment agencies including their fee-charging practices. The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to report on all measures being taken or envisaged to overcome the shortcomings of the legislation in force, particularly Law No. 39/2004.

In its previous observation the Committee noted that the Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) concluded with the Government of Malaysia in May 2006 does not guarantee standard labour protections; does not include measures to prevent and respond to cases of abuse; and contains provisions that contribute to maintaining Indonesian migrant workers in situations of great vulnerability, particularly through its authorization for employers to confiscate and hold workers' passports. The Committee notes with concern that in its latest report the Government, in referring to this authorization under the MoU, appears to justify the practice as having a protective purpose and as benefiting the workers concerned, and it also refers to a makeshift programme involving the printing of a worker ID card "as a passport substitute". The Committee hopes that the Government will take steps without delay to amend its MoU with the Government of Malaysia to prohibit employer withholding of worker passports, to eliminate all other restrictions on the fundamental rights of domestic and other migrant workers, to guarantee standard labour protections, and to provide for measures to prevent and respond to cases of worker abuse. The Committee trusts that the Government will ensure that similar safeguards and protections are included in all other such bilateral agreements, including the 13 agreements referred to by the Government in its report. The Committee would be grateful for information from the Government in its next report indicating the progress made, as well as copies of all memoranda of understanding it refers to in its report.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government's report, as well as copies of relevant legislative texts attached as appendices. The Committee also notes the discussion of the Committee on the Application of Standards which took place during the 97th Session of the Conference in June 2008, and the conclusions of that Committee, which, inter alia, called upon the Government to supply detailed information to the Committee in its next report on the progress made in bringing its legislation into conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee notes, however, that the Government's report contains little new information in reply to the Committee's earlier comments. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government's next report will contain full particulars on the matters raised by the Committee in its earlier comments and discussed below. The Committee also hopes that the Government will consider the possibility of availing itself of ILO technical assistance, in order to facilitate the process of bringing its law and practice into conformity with the Convention.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Use of forced labour as a punishment for expressing views opposed to the established political, social or economic system. 1. The Committee notes the text supplied by the Government, indicating that Presidential Decree No. 11 of 1963 on the eradication of subversive or rebellious activities, which contained provisions punishing the distortion, undermining or deviation from the ideology of Pancasila State or the broad policy lines of the State, was repealed by Law No. 26 of 1999. While considering this to be a step forward, the Committee observes, as it has in comments addressed to the Government since 2003, that sentences of imprisonment (which involve compulsory prison labour under articles 14 and 19 of the Criminal Code and articles 57(1) and 59(2) of the Prisons Regulations) may be imposed under sections 107(a), 107(d) and 107(e) of Law No. 27 of 1999 on Revision of the Criminal Code in relation to crimes against state security, upon any person who disseminates or develops the teachings of "Communism/Marxism-Leninism" orally, in writing or through any media, or establishes an organization based on such teachings, or establishes relations with such an organization, with a view to replacing Pancasila as the State's foundation. The Committee has repeatedly requested that the Government take necessary measures to repeal or amend sections 107(a), 107(d) and 107(e) of Law No. 27/1999, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes that once again the Government's report contains no information about steps being taken or contemplated towards that end. It notes the statement of the Government representative during the discussion of this case by the Conference Committee in June 2008 that Law No. 27/1999 was developed by members of Parliament and adopted through a national consensus and therefore remained valid. While noting this statement, the Committee shares the view of the Conference Committee that compliance with ratified Conventions requires steps beyond reliance on national consensus. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken without delay to bring sections 107(a), 107(d) and 107(e) of Law No. 27/1999 into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will soon be in a position to report on progress achieved in that regard.

2. In its previous comments the Committee has noted that Law No. 9 of 1998 on the Freedom of Expression in Public imposes certain restrictions on the expression of ideas in public during public gatherings, demonstrations, parades, etc., and that sections 15, 16, and 17 of the Act provide for the enforcement of those restrictions with penal sanctions by way of reference to "applicable" criminal provisions. The Committee requested the Government to identify those sanctions, supplying copies of the relevant texts, and to provide information on the application of Law No. 9/1998 in practice, including copies of court decisions defining or illustrating its scope, so as to enable the Committee to assess its conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes that during the discussion of this case by the Conference Committee in June of 2008, the Government representative stated only that sanctions for non-compliance with Law No. 9/1998 were contained in sections 15, 16 and 17 of that Act. The Committee notes that the Government has supplied a copy of the Act, but once again has provided no information that could identify the applicable criminal penalties, as referred to in sections 15, 16 and 17; nor has it provided information on the application of the Act in practice, including copies of court decisions defining or illustrating its scope. The Committee trusts that the Government will provide the information requested above in its next report.

3. The Committee notes the statement of the Government's representative in the Conference Committee indicating that the draft revision of the Criminal Code was still not completed. In its previous observation, the Committee noted information indicating that the Constitutional Court, in its ruling on Case No. 6/PUU-V/2007, found articles 154 and 155 of the Criminal Code to be contrary to the Constitution of 1945. These articles establish the penalty of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) for up to seven years and four and a half years, respectively, for a person who publicly gives expression to feelings of hostility, hatred or contempt against the Government (article 154) or who disseminates, openly demonstrates or puts up a writing containing such feelings, with the intent to give publicity to the contents or to enhance the publicity thereof (article 155). The Committee further noted that, in ruling No. 013-022/PUU-IV/2006, the Constitutional Court found that it was inappropriate for Indonesia to maintain articles 134, 136bis and 137 of the Criminal Code (respecting deliberate insults against the President or the Vice-President), since they negate the principle of equality before the law, diminish freedom of expression and opinion, freedom of information and the principle of legal certainty. Accordingly, in the view of the Constitutional Court, the new draft text of the Criminal Code must also exclude provisions that are identical or similar to those of articles 134, 136bis and 137 of the Criminal Code.

Furthermore, the Committee noted the cases of several persons convicted to heavy sentences of imprisonment, involving compulsory labour, for the peaceful expression of their political opinions, their peaceful support to an independence movement, or for the simple fact of having raised a separatist flag in the eastern provinces of Papua and West Irian Jaya, under the above provisions of the Criminal Code and article 106, under which a maximum sentence of imprisonment of 20 years may be imposed for an attempt to separate part of the territory of the State.

The Committee once again expresses its deep concern and hopes that the Government will take into account the rulings of the Constitutional Court in the context of the adoption of the new Criminal Code. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the Code as soon as it has been adopted. In the meantime, it requests the Government to indicate the manner in which articles 106, 134, 136bis and 137 of the Penal Code are applied in practice, with copies of any court rulings issued thereunder.

Article 1(d). Recourse to compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. In its previous observation the Committee requested the Government to take appropriate measures to amend sections 139 and 185 of the Manpower Act so as to limit their scope to essential services in the strict sense of the term and to ensure that no penalty involving compulsory labour can be imposed on persons participating in strikes, as required by the Convention. The Committee notes the conclusions of the Conference Committee referred to above, in which it urged the Government to take, without delay, all the necessary measures to eliminate sanctions involving compulsory labour that could be imposed for participation in strikes, so as to bring its law and practice into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will take measures without further delay to amend sections 139 and 185 of the Manpower Act so as to ensure that no penalty involving compulsory labour can be imposed on persons participating in strikes. While awaiting this amendment, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the effect given in practice to articles 139 and 185, including copies of court decisions defining or illustrating their scope.

Jamaica

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1962)

Article 1(1) and Article 2(1) and (2)(c), of the Convention. Work of prisoners for private companies. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to section 155(2) of the Correctional Institution (Adult Correction Centre) Rules of 1991, under which no inmate may be employed in the service of, or for the private benefit of, any person, except with the authority of the Commissioner or in pursuance of special rules. The Committee noted that, under section 60(b) of the Corrections Act, as amended by the Corrections (Amendment) Act, 1995, the Minister may establish programmes under which persons serving a sentence in a correctional institution may be directed by the superintendent to undertake work in any company or organization approved by the Commissioner, subject to such provisions as may be prescribed relating to their employment, discipline and control, and such work may be within the centre or institution or outside its limits. The Committee also noted the information concerning the functioning of the Correctional Services Production Company (COSPROD), as well as the Government's repeated statement that, under this programme, some inmates had been working under the conditions of a freely accepted employment relationship, with their formal consent and subject to guarantees regarding the payment of normal wages.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its latest report that the Department of Correctional Services has not yet entered into any discussion regarding a change in a policy for the issues raised. The Government confirms its previous indication that there is no activity which is undertaken through forced labour and that participation of inmates in the work on farms managed by COSPROD is voluntary.

The Committee expresses the firm hope, referring also to the explanations provided in paragraphs 59–60 and 114–120 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, that section 155(2) of the Correctional Institution (Adult Correction Centre) Rules, will be amended so as to ensure that no prisoners may work for private individuals, companies, etc., except where they do so voluntarily, with their free and formal consent and under conditions approximating a free labour relationship, which include wage levels (leaving room for deductions and attachments), social security and occupational safety and health, in order to bring this provision into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. The Committee again requests the Government to provide a copy of any special rules referred to in the above section 155(2) and to continue to provide information on its application in practice, pending the amendment.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the following provisions of the Jamaica Shipping Act, 1998, under which certain disciplinary offences are punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour under the Prisons Law):

- section 178(1)(b), (c) and (e), which provides for penalties of imprisonment, inter alia, for wilful disobedience or neglect of duty or combining with any of the crews to impede the progress of the voyage; an exemption from this liability applies only to seafarers participating in a lawful strike after the ship has arrived and has been secured in good safety to the satisfaction of the master at a port, and only at a port in Jamaica (section 178(2));

- section 179(a) and (b), which punishes with similar penalties the offences of desertion and absence without leave.

The Committee noted the Government's indications in its 2004 report that the Maritime Authority had given written instructions to the Attorney General's Department and the Office of the Parliamentary Council to amend the above sections of the Shipping Act, 1998, in order to make its provisions compatible with the Convention. In its latest report, the Government states again that no response has been received from the abovementioned bodies on the Maritime Authority's request.

The Committee recalls, referring also to paragraphs 179 to 181 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, that provisions under which penalties of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) may be imposed for desertion, absence without leave or disobedience are incompatible with the Convention. Only sanctions relating to acts that are likely to endanger the safety of the ship or the life or health of persons (e.g. as provided for in section 177 of the 1998 Shipping Act) have no bearing on the Convention.

The Committee trusts that the necessary measures will at last be taken to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, e.g. by limiting the scope of the relevant provisions of the Shipping Act, 1998, as indicated above, and that the Government will soon be in a position to report the progress made in this regard.

Japan

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1932)

1. In its earlier comments, the Committee examined the issues of sexual slavery (so-called "comfort women") and industrial slavery during the Second World War. The Committee refers in this connection to its earlier considerations concerning the limits of its mandate in respect of these historical breaches of the Convention. In 2006, the Committee in its observation firmly repeated its hope that the Government would in the immediate future take measures to respond to the claims of the surviving victims, the number of whom have continued to decline with the passing years. The Committee also requested the Government to continue to inform it about any recent judicial decisions and related developments. In its 2007 observation, the Committee, in addition, requested the Government to respond to the communications by the workers' organizations.

2. The Committee notes the information communicated by the Government in its reports received on 10 July 2008, 1 September 2008 and 17 October 2008, as well as the Government's electronic communications dated 10 and 18 October 2008.

Comments received from workers' organizations

3. In 2008, the Committee has received further information from a number of workers' organizations, such as:

- All-Japan Shipbuilding and Engineering Union (dated 25 May and 21 August 2008);
- Tokyo Regional Council of Trade Unions (Tokyo-Chihyo) (dated 27 May and 20 August 2008);
- All-Japan Dockworkers Union-Nagoya Branch (dated 25 May and 2 June 2008);
- Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU) and the Korean Confederation of Trade Unions (KCTU) (dated August 2008);
- Heavy Industry Labor Union (Japan) (dated 25 August 2008);
- Teachers' Union of Nagoya Municipal High School (dated 26 August 2008);
- Aichi Union Seibonoie Branch (dated 25 August 2008);
- International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) (dated 2 September 2008);
- Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC-RENGO) (dated 17 September 2008).

Copies of these communications were forwarded to the Government for any comments it might wish to make. The Committee notes the Government's response to these communications received on 19 November 2008.

4. The above communications of the workers' organizations referred, inter alia, to the status of cases pending in Japanese courts involving claims by victims of wartime industrial forced labour. The Committee notes that, according to the information communicated by the Tokyo Regional Council of Trade Unions (Tokyo-Chihyo), as of 31 July 2008 there were five such cases pending in the appellate courts. In all of these cases the lower courts had dismissed the claims, either on procedural grounds as time-barred and barred by state immunity or as having been waived by post-war treaties and communiqués. In two cases, final judgements dismissing the appeals were issued in July of 2008 by the Supreme Court of Japan, including the Niigata case, which involved a favourable decision on 26 March 2004 by the Niigata District Court and a judgement awarding compensation of 8 million yen to each victim, but which was subsequently overturned by the Tokyo High Court on 14 March 2007.

5. The Committee notes the indication of the Tokyo Regional Council of Trade Unions (Tokyo-Chihyo), in its communication dated 20 August 2008, that in one of the cases pending before the Fukuoka High Court, the court issued a ruling on 21 April 2008, in which it recommended that the parties, including the Government of Japan as one of the defendants, seek reconciliation and an amicable settlement of the claims involved. The All-Japan Dockworkers Union-Nagoya Branch, in its communication dated 2 June 2008, referred to a petition for a recommendation for reconciliation and amicable settlement lodged with the Japan Supreme Court, in the case against the Government of Japan and Mitsubishi Heavy Industries, Ltd, brought by Korean victims of wartime industrial forced labour, the petition having been lodged after the Government of Japan declined to respond to a recommendation for settlement made by the Nagoya High Court in its judgement on 31 May 2007.

6. The communications from the workers' organizations also referred to the issue of military sexual slavery as it continues to be taken up by several UN bodies, in particular, in the form of recommendations of the Working Group (of the UN Human Rights Council) on the Universal Periodic Review adopted in May 2008 (A/HRC/8/44, paragraph 60); as an item on the List of Issues taken up by the UN Human Rights Committee (CCPR/C/JPN/Q/5), in connection with its consideration in September 2008 of the Government's fifth periodic report under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights; and in recommendations of the UN Committee against Torture in connection with its consideration, in May 2007, of the first periodic report of the Government under the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT/C/JPN/CO/1, paragraphs 12 and 24).

7. The communications from the workers' organizations also referred to recent motions and resolutions on the issue of military sexual slavery adopted by several parliamentary bodies, which call for further measures to be taken by the Government of Japan. These include: a unanimous resolution passed by the lower house of the Netherlands Parliament on 20 November 2007; Motion 291 passed by the House of Commons of Canada on 28 November 2007; a joint motion for a resolution on "Justice for 'Comfort Women'", adopted by the European Parliament on 13 December 2007; as well as resolutions adopted by the Japanese District Councils of Takarazuka and Tokyo Kiyose on 25 March 2008 and 25 June 2008, respectively, urging the Government to take measures to examine and reveal the historical truth about the issue, to restore dignity and justice to the victims, to provide them with compensation, and to further educate the public.

Government's response

8. The Committee notes the Government's indication, in its report received on 1 September 2008, that as of 31 May 2008 there were 13 cases still pending in the Japanese courts involving claims by victims of military sexual slavery and wartime industrial forced labour (one and 12 cases, respectively). According to the report, during the period from 1 June 2006 to 31 May 2008 the courts pronounced on these issues in three "comfort women" cases (two cases by the Supreme Court and one at the district court level) and in 17 "conscripted forced labour" cases (seven cases by the Supreme Court, five judgements at the high court level, and five at the district court level). The Government also indicates that: "In all these cases, the courts have dismissed the plaintiffs' claims for compensation against the GOJ in accordance with domestic law and international law including the relevant treaties settling war-related issues".

9. The Committee notes the Government's indications in its report received on 1 September 2008 and in its electronic communications of 10 and 18 October 2008 that, with regard to the issue of "comfort women", the position of the Government expressed in the August 1993 statement of the then Chief Cabinet Secretary, Yohei Kono, in connection with a report on the findings of a government inquiry, had remained unchanged and continued to represent the Government's present position on this matter, and that the new Prime Minister Taro Aso had recently reaffirmed his support for this statement. The statement reads in part as follows:

Undeniably, this was an act, with the involvement of the military authorities of the day, that severely injured the honour and dignity of many women. The Government of Japan would like to take this opportunity once again to extend its sincere apologies and remorse to all those, irrespective of place of origin, who suffered immeasurable pain and incurable physical and psychological wounds as comfort women ... It is incumbent upon us, the Government of Japan, to continue to consider seriously, while listening to the views of learned circles, how best we can express this sentiment ...

10. The Committee has noted from the Government's statements in its report received on 1 September 2008, as well as in its replies to and comments on the recommendations of UN bodies referred to above, that with regard to non-legal measures to respond to the claims of surviving victims of wartime industrial forced labour and military sexual slavery and to meet their expectations, the Government has placed a heavy, almost exclusive emphasis on the Asian Women's Fund (AWF) and its related activities, an initiative launched in 1995 and continued until the Fund was dissolved on 31 March 2007, and that the AWF appears to constitute the sole measure the Government has contemplated taking to fulfil its acknowledged moral responsibility to the victims. The Committee recalls that in its 2001 and 2003 observations it considered that the rejection by the majority of former "comfort women" of monies from the AWF because it was not seen as compensation from the Government, and the rejection, by some, of the letter sent by the Prime Minister to the few who accepted monies from the Fund as not accepting government responsibility, suggested that this measure had not met the expectations of the majority of the victims. The Committee therefore expressed the hope that the Government would make efforts, in consultation with the surviving victims and the organizations which represent them, to find an alternative way to compensate the victims in a manner that would meet their expectations. The Committee recalls in this connection the Government's statement in its report received on 26 September 2006, with reference to the dissolution of the AWF in March 2007, that it "will continue to make efforts to seek further reconciliation with the victims".

11. The Committee hopes that in making these further efforts to seek reconciliation with the victims, the Government will, in the immediate future, take measures to respond to the claims being made by the aged surviving victims. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information about recent judicial decisions and related developments.

Jordan

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1966)

Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention. Prison labour. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to Prison Regulations No. 1 of 1955 issued under the Prison Act of 1953, which provided that prisoners might carry out work for an officer or members of the army by authorization of the Minister of Defence (section 8(e)). The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Government confirms that all prison regulations issued under the Prison Act No. 23 of 1953, which has been repealed by Act No. 9 of 2004 on Reformatory and Rehabilitation Centres, have become null and void.

Kenya

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1964)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Compulsory labour in connection with the conservation of natural resources. For many years, the Committee has been referring to sections 13 to 18 of the Chief's Authority Act (Cap. 128), according to which able-bodied male persons between 18 and 45 years of age may be required to perform any work or service in connection with the conservation of natural resources for up to 60 days in any year. On numerous occasions, the Committee asked the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend these provisions, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. However, as the Committee noted previously, the amendments introduced by Act No. 10 of 1997 not only failed to bring the legislation into compliance with the Convention, but the non-compliance was even aggravated by raising the age limit for call-up for compulsory labour to 50 years of age.

The Committee has noted that, in its latest report, the Government has confirmed its previous indication that the task force on the review of labour laws addressed the issue of compulsory labour required by the Chief's Authority Act (Cap. 128). The Government states that the Act is to be replaced with the Administrative Authority Bill, and meanwhile the principles of the Convention have been incorporated in the Employment Bill, which prohibits forced labour, subject to permitted exemptions.

The Committee has noted with interest the adoption of the Employment Act (No. 11 of 2007), which prohibits the exaction of forced or compulsory labour (section 4(1) and (2)). While noting this information, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Administrative Authority Bill, which is intended to replace the Chief's Authority Act, will be adopted in the near future and that the legislation will be brought into conformity with the Convention. It asks the Government to supply a copy of the Administrative Authority Act, as soon as it is adopted.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1964)

Article 1(a), (c) and (d), of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views, for breaches of labour discipline and for the participation in strikes. Since many years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Penal Code, the Public Order Act, the Prohibited Publications Order, 1968, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1967, and the Trade Disputes Act (Cap. 234), under which sentences of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed as a punishment for the display of emblems or the distribution of publications signifying association with a political object or political organization, for various breaches of discipline in the merchant marine and for participation in certain forms of strikes.

The Committee has noted the Government's repeated statement in its reports that it is committed to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention. It notes from the Government's latest report that the Merchant Shipping Act, 1967, has been reviewed and is looking forward to receiving a copy of the revised legislation. The Committee expresses the firm hope that all the abovementioned provisions will soon be brought into conformity with the Convention and that the Government will report on the progress achieved in this regard. It also asks the Government to provide information on various points raised in a more detailed request addressed directly to the Government.

Kuwait

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1968)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Freedom of domestic workers to terminate employment. In its earlier comments, the Committee expressed concern about the conditions under which domestic servants can leave their employment and their possibility to have recourse to courts if necessary. The Committee noted that the Labour Code currently in force excludes domestic workers. It also noted the Government's indications that the new draft Labour Code would cover this category of workers and that, under section 5 of the draft Labour Code, the competent minister would make an order specifying the rules governing the relationship between domestic servants and their employers. Having noted that the new Labour Code has not yet been adopted, the Committee requested the Government to supply a copy of Order No. 362, of 4 April 2004, issued by the Council of Ministers, which provides for the establishment of a permanent committee for the regulation of the situation of migrant workers in the private sector, including domestic workers, under the chairmanship of the Minister of Social Affairs and Labour.

The Committee trusts that the new Labour Code, once adopted, will provide adequate protection for domestic workers as regards their freedom to terminate employment, and that the Government will communicate a copy of the new Code, as soon as it is adopted. The Committee again requests the Government to communicate a copy of the Council of Minister's Order No. 362, which, as the Government indicated, was attached to the report, but has not been received in the ILO. Please also provide information on the activities of the permanent committee on migrant workers referred to above, as well as sample copies of contracts of employment concluded with domestic workers in accordance with the model contract issued by the Ministry of Interior.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25. Trafficking in persons. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that the victims of forced labour have the right to turn to the authorities, though without being allowed to stay in the country during the civil action unless their legal residence allows them to do so. The Committee asked the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to allow the victims of trafficking to turn to the authorities and to stay in the country at least for the duration of court proceedings.

In its latest report, the Government merely states that victims of trafficking, as any other persons suffering from unjust acts, have the right to turn to the authorities and to courts to defend their rights. The Committee refers in this connection to the explanations provided in paragraphs 73–85 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, where it observed that victims of trafficking are often perceived by the authorities as illegal aliens and that they should be granted permission to stay in the country to defend their rights and should be efficiently protected from reprisals if they are willing to testify; the protection of victims of trafficking may also contribute to law enforcement and to the effective punishment of perpetrators.

The Committee hopes that the Government will indicate, in its next report, measures taken or envisaged both in legislation and in practice, to prevent, suppress and punish trafficking in persons, including victim protection measures, such as, for example, protection of victims willing to testify from reprisals by the exploiters or any measures to encourage the victims to turn to the authorities and to stay in the country at least for the duration of court proceedings. Please also indicate whether there is an intention to introduce penal provisions aiming specifically at the punishment of trafficking in persons.

Article 25. Penal sanctions for the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour. The Committee previously noted that the legislation does not contain any specific provision under which the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour is punishable as a penal offence, and invited the Government to take the necessary measures, for example by introducing a new provision to that effect in the legislation. The Committee noted that the Government had referred in its reports to various penal provisions (such as sections 49 and 57 of Law No. 31 of 1970 on the amendment of the Penal Code, or section 121 of the Penal Code) prohibiting public officials or employees to force a worker to perform a job for the State or for any public body, as well as to section 173 of the Penal Code, which provides for the imposition of penalties on anyone who threatens another person physically or with damage to his reputation or property with a view to forcing the victim to do something or to refrain from doing something.

The Committee pointed out that the abovementioned provisions do not appear to be sufficient to give effect to Article 25 of the Convention which stipulates that “the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a penal offence”, and that “it shall be an obligation on any Member ratifying this Convention to ensure that the penalties imposed by law are really adequate and strictly enforced”.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures (e.g. through the adoption of the new Labour Code or through the amendment of the Penal Code) in order to give full effect to this Article of the Convention. Pending the adoption of such measures, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the application of the above penal provisions in practice, supplying copies of the court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

The Committee is also addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Punishment for expressing political views. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to Legislative Decree No. 65 of 1979 concerning public meetings and gatherings, which establishes a system of prior authorization (which may be refused without giving reasons, under section 6 of the above Decree) and, in the event of violations, provides for a penalty of imprisonment involving, by virtue of the Penal Code, an obligation to work. The Committee stressed the importance for the effective observance of the Convention of legal guarantees respecting the right of assembly and the direct bearing that a restriction of this right can have on the application of the Convention. Indeed, it is often through the exercise of this right that political opposition to the established order can be expressed, and in ratifying the Convention the State has undertaken to guarantee persons who manifest this opposition in a peaceful manner the protection that the Convention affords them.

The Committee has noted the Government's indication in its report received in August 2007 that consultations will be held with the competent authorities to discuss the feasibility of amending section 2 of the above Legislative Decree, which provides for the exemption of certain kinds of meetings from its scope. However, the Committee has become aware that Legislative Decree No. 65 of 1979 was declared unconstitutional by the Constitutional Court in 2006. It has also noted that a new law concerning public meetings and gatherings was promulgated in 2008. The Committee would appreciate it if the Government would communicate a copy of the new law with its next report, so that the Committee can examine it at its next session.

Article 2(c) and (d). Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. For many years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of Legislative Decree No. 31 of 1980 regarding security, order and discipline on board ship, under which various breaches of discipline (unauthorized absence, repeated disobedience, failure to return to the vessel) committed by common agreement by three persons may be punished by imprisonment involving an obligation to work. The Committee recalled that penalties imposed for violations of labour discipline or punishment for having participated in a strike do not come within the scope of the Convention only where such acts endanger the safety of the vessel or the life or health of persons, but that sections 11, 12 and 13 of the above Legislative Decree do not limit the application of the penalties to such acts.

The Committee has noted the Government's repeated statement that it gives utmost priority to the adoption of the necessary measures to remove any conflict with the provisions of the Convention. The Government also states that Legislative Decree No. 31 of 1980 is intended to address dangerous acts which endanger the safety of the vessel or the life or health of persons on board, and the imposition of penalties is restricted in all cases to such acts.

While noting these indications, the Committee reiterates its hope that the necessary measures to amend Legislative Decree No. 31 of 1980 will be taken, e.g. by clearly indicating that the imposition of penalties involving compulsory labour is strictly limited to acts endangering the vessel or the life or health of persons. Pending the adoption of such measures, the Committee requests the Government to supply information on the application of the above Legislative Decree in practice, supplying copies of court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

Liberia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1931)

The Committee notes the Government's brief report on the application of the Convention. It hopes that the Government's next report will contain full and detailed information on the following matters raised in the Committee's earlier comments.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Forced labour and captivity practices in connection with armed conflict. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the allegations concerning forced labour and captivity practices which took place in the south-eastern part of the country in connection with armed conflict, where children were allegedly held hostage by adults and used as a source of forced and captive labour. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that the special investigation committee sent by the Government to investigate the alleged forced labour practices in the south-eastern region recommended that a national committee be established to trace and reunite displaced women and children taken captive during the war and that, in order to enhance the National Reconciliation and Reunification Programmes, "local authorities should be directed to encourage their citizens to report any acts of alleged forced labour, intimidation, harassment, maltreatment for appropriate investigation and corrective measures".

While having noted that the south-eastern part of the country was in a grave humanitarian crisis and an extreme state of poverty and that any reported situations of forced labour exploitation were due to the consequences of the war, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government would encourage joint efforts and cooperation between governmental bodies and non-governmental organizations at all levels with a view to the effective elimination of all forms of compulsory labour, including that of children, and requested the Government to supply full information on measures taken to this end.

The Committee notes the Government's brief indication in its report supplied in May 2008 that a tripartite national committee is being considered to investigate the complaints of forced labour and hostage situation in the south-eastern region, that consultations for this investigation have already begun and the committee is expected to start its work in the near future. The Committee reiterates the firm hope that the Government will provide, in its next report, full information on the activities of the abovementioned tripartite national committee and on the specific action taken to investigate the situation in the South-East as regards the alleged practices of forced labour, as well as on the measures taken to eliminate such practices. The Committee also hopes that the Government will supply information on the results achieved in this regard by the Liberian Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), which was set up to investigate human rights violations and was empowered to recommend for prosecution the most serious offenders, as well as information on the progress achieved in the establishment of an Independent National Human Rights Commission and drawing up of a national human rights action plan.

Recalling also that, under Article 25 of the Convention, the illegal exaction of forced labour shall be punishable as a penal offence and it shall be an obligation of the State to ensure that the penalties imposed are really adequate and are strictly enforced, the Committee hopes that the necessary action to give effect to this Article will be taken in the near future, by imposing penal sanctions on persons convicted of having exacted forced labour, and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on any legal proceedings which have been instituted for that purpose and on any penalties imposed.

The Committee is also addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Imposition of prison sentences involving the obligation to work as punishment for expressing political views. In its earlier comments the Committee observed that prison sentences (involving, under Chapter 34, section 34-14, paragraph 1, of the Liberian Code of Laws, an obligation to work) might be imposed in circumstances falling within Article 1(a) of the Convention under section 52(1)(b) of the Penal Law (punishing certain forms of criticism of the Government) and section 216 of the Election Law (punishing participation in activities that seek to continue or revive certain political parties). The Committee also requested the Government to provide a copy of Decree No. 88A of 1985 relating to criticism of the Government.

The Committee has noted the Government's indication in its report that section 216 of the Election Law and Decree No. 88A of 1985 have been repealed. Since the copies of repealing Acts referred to by the Government as annexed to its report have not been received at the ILO, the Committee hopes that copies will soon be forwarded. The Committee also requests the Government to state whether section 52(1)(b) of the Penal Law is still in force and, if so, to indicate the measures taken with a view to ensuring observance of the Convention.

The Committee previously noted that under a Decree adopted by the People's Redemption Council before its dissolution in July 1984, parties can be forbidden if they are considered to have engaged in activities or expressed objectives which go against the republican form of government or basic Liberian values. The Committee again requests the Government to indicate whether the provisions of this Decree are still in force and, if so, to provide a copy of the text of the Decree.

Article 1(c). Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its earlier comments the Committee noted that under section 347(1) and (2) of the Maritime Law, local authorities shall apprehend and deliver a seafarer who deserts from a vessel with the intention of not returning to duty and who remains unlawfully in a foreign country. Referring to paragraph 171 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee must point out that measures to ensure the due performance by a worker of his service under compulsion of law (in the form of physical constraint or the menace of a penalty) constitute forced or compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline and are thus incompatible with the Convention. The Committee hopes that section 347(1) and (2) of the Maritime Law will soon be repealed and that the Government will supply information on the measures taken to this end.

The Committee also noted that under section 348 of the Maritime Law various other offences against labour discipline by seafarers such as incitement to neglect duty, assembling with others in a tumultuous manner, may be punished with imprisonment of up to five years (involving an obligation to work). The Committee refers to paragraph 179 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour where it pointed out that sanctions relating to acts tending to endanger the ship or the life or health of persons on board do not fall within the scope of the Convention. However, as regards more generally breaches of labour discipline such as desertion, absence without leave or disobedience, all sanctions involving compulsory labour should be abolished under the Convention. In a great number of maritime nations, similar penal provisions have been repealed, restricted in scope to cases involving a danger to the ship or the life or health of persons, or otherwise amended so as to provide for a fine or some other penalty not falling within the scope of the Convention. The Committee therefore again expresses the hope that measures will be taken to bring section 348 of the Maritime Law into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will provide information on the action taken to this end.

In its earlier comments the Committee referred to Decree No. 12 of 30 June 1980 prohibiting strikes. It notes the Government's statement in its report that a draft law repealing the abovementioned Decree is now before the competent authority for passing into law. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the repealing law as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Mauritius

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1969)

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In comments made since 1992, the Committee has observed that, under sections 183(1) and 184(1) of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1986, certain breaches of discipline by seafarers (such as desertion, neglect or refusal to join the ship, absence without leave, neglect of duty) are punishable by imprisonment (under conditions involving the performance of compulsory labour), and that under section 183(1), (3) and (4), seafarers who are not citizens of Mauritius, and who commit such offences, may be forcibly conveyed on board ship for the purpose of proceeding to sea. Referring to paragraph 180 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee recalls that, in order to be compatible with the Convention, provisions imposing penalties of imprisonment on seafarers for breaches of labour discipline should be restricted to actions that endanger the safety of the ship, or the life or health of persons on board. In its previous observation, the Committee reiterated its hope that the Merchant Shipping Act would be brought into conformity with the Convention in the near future, and that the Government would soon be able to indicate further progress achieved in this regard.

The Committee notes that, in its latest report, the Government refers to the Merchant Shipping Bill 2007, which aims to repeal and replace the Merchant Shipping Act of 1986. The Government states that the Bill “takes on board the observation” of the Committee. According to the Explanatory Memorandum of the Bill, it “makes better provision for the incorporation of the international conventions to which Mauritius is a party and of the protocols which apply to this country”. The Committee notes that the Bill no longer contains a separate provision on offences by seafarers, nor does it contain any provision making explicit reference to such breaches of discipline by seafarers as desertion, neglect or refusal to join the ship, or absence without leave. It further notes, however, that, under section 217(16)(n), the Bill continues to treat disobedience as a criminal offence, punishable by imprisonment (involving the imposition of compulsory labour), in penalizing a seafarer who “refuses to obey the master’s order, neglects his duty or assaults any member of the crew”. The Committee also notes the overly broad and vague wording of section 217(16)(j) of the Bill, which provides that “any person” (and therefore presumably any seafarer) who on board a ship so conducts himself that he is likely “to cause interference or annoyance to the other persons on board the ship” commits an offence punishable by imprisonment, and observes that it also raises problems of compatibility with the Convention.

The Committee therefore observes that the Merchant Shipping Bill 2007 continues to provide for criminal sanctions, involving imprisonment attended by the imposition of compulsory labour, for breaches of labour discipline that fall within the scope of activities protected under Article 1(c) of the Convention. The Committee trusts that the Government will take measures to further amend the Merchant Shipping Bill 2007, so as to ensure that its provisions are in conformity with the Convention, and that it will communicate a copy of the Bill as soon as it has been adopted into law.

Article 1(d). Sanctions for participation in strikes. The Committee has noted the observations in the communication of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (now the International Trade Union Confederation) dated 6 July 2006, as well as the Government’s reply to these comments in its communication of 18 October 2006. In its previous comments the Committee referred to the need to revise the Industrial Relations Act 1973 (IRA) in order to bring it into line with the Convention. In particular, it observed that, under sections 82 and 83 of the IRA, submission of any industrial dispute to compulsory arbitration is left to the discretion of the Minister; that the decision handed down following this procedure is enforceable (section 85) and any strike becomes unlawful (section 92); and that participation in a strike thus prohibited may be punished by imprisonment (section 102), a sanction which involves compulsory labour by virtue of section 35(1)(a) of the Reform Institutions Act. The Committee recalls, referring also to paragraphs 182–186 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, that provisions for compulsory arbitration enforceable with sanctions that involve compulsory labour are incompatible with the Convention.

Referring to its comments addressed to the Government under Convention No. 87, likewise ratified by Mauritius, the Committee notes the adoption of the Employment Relations Act, 2008 (ERA) which, once proclaimed, will replace the Industrial Relations Act 1973 (IRA). However, the Committee notes that section 82(1)(b) of the ERA provides that, where the duration of a strike which is not unlawful is such that an industry or a service is likely to be seriously affected, or employment is threatened, the Prime Minister may apply to the Supreme Court for an order prohibiting the continuation of the strike. It notes further that section 82(3) of the ERA provides that, where the Supreme Court makes an order under subsection (1)(b), it shall refer the matter to the Tribunal for arbitration. The Committee considers that this amendment, which transfers authority from the Prime Minister to the Supreme Court, still allows for the imposition by the authorities of compulsory arbitration procedures, enforceable by penal sanctions against participants in strikes that involve the imposition of compulsory labour and, therefore, is incompatible with Convention No. 105.

The Committee trusts that measures will be taken in the near future to further amend section 82 of the Employment Relations Act 2008 so as to ensure, in conformity with the Convention, that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed for the mere fact of participating in a peaceful strike. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report progress made with regard to the proclamation of the ERA and to communicate the complete text as soon as it enters into force.

Morocco

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

Article 2, paragraph 2(d), of the Convention. Requisitioning of persons. In its previous comment, the Committee once again stressed the need to amend or repeal several legislative texts which authorize the requisitioning of persons and goods in order to satisfy national needs (the Dahirs of 10 August 1915 and 25 March 1918, as retained in the Dahir of 13 September 1938 and reintroduced by Decree No. 2-63-436 of 6 November 1963). Indeed, these provisions went beyond what is authorized under Article 2, paragraph 2(d), of the Convention, according to which requisitioning, and constantly imposing work, should be strictly limited to situations endangering the existence or well-being of the whole or part of the population.

In its report, the Government points out that the Labour Directorate is in constant contact with the Ministry of the Interior in order to review the provisions of the Dahir of 1938 to bring it into conformity with the Convention, and that the public authorities have never, in practice, resorted to the requisitioning of persons. The Committee takes note of this information. It points out that, in its 2003 report, the Government had already referred to an agreement with the social partners to repeal this decree. Given the number of years that have lapsed since its first comments on the matter, the general consensus that the provisions of the legislation should be changed and the fact that, in practice, these provisions have never allegedly been used, the Committee hopes that the contacts with the Ministry of the Interior will result in the adoption of specific legislative measures without further delay.

Article 25. Imposition of really effective penalties. In its last comments, the Committee expressed its reservations as to the dissuasive nature of the penalties against persons guilty of exacting forced labour in the legislation. According to sections 10 and 12 of the new Labour Code, any employer in breach of the prohibition to requisition employees to perform forced labour or to work against their will, is liable to a fine of between 25,000 and 30,000 dirhams and, in the event of a repeated offence, a fine of double that amount and imprisonment for between six days and three months, or one of these two penalties. Only cases of repeated violations of the prohibition of forced labour may be penalized by a prison sentence, although the judge might, however, opt for a mere fine if he or she considers it appropriate.

In its report, the Government points out that the fines provided under section 12 of the Labour Code are the maximum provided under this legislation, and that a prison sentence has serious consequences for the person involved because he or she is subsequently illegible for public office or able to compete for public markets. The Committee takes note of these details. Given the seriousness of the offence of resorting to forced labour, the Committee is of the opinion that the penalties imposed must be effective enough to ensure that they are truly of a dissuasive nature. The Committee hopes that the Government will re-examine this matter, either in the context of a revision of the Labour Code or by criminalizing forced labour in the Penal Code and establishing the corresponding penalties for offences or crimes.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1966)

Article 1(d) of the Convention. Imposition of prison sentences involving an obligation to work as punishment for having participated in strikes. In its previous comments, the Committee pointed out how proper application of the Convention could be affected by too broad interpretation by national courts of the provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code. According to this provision, anyone, who through violence, the use of force, threats or deception, causes or maintains, or endeavours to cause or maintain, a concerted stoppage of work with the aim of forcing an increase or decrease in wages or jeopardizing the free exercise of industry or work, is liable to a sentence of imprisonment of from one month to two years. It also pointed out that sentences of imprisonment involve an obligation to work pursuant to section 28 of the Penal Code and section 35 of Act No. 23-98 on the organization and operation of prisons.

In its latest report, the Government states that the obligation to work established in section 28 of the Penal Code and 35 of the Act on the organization and operation of prisons applies to convicts, and that prison labour is excluded from the definition of forced labour given in Convention No. 29. The Government again asserts that there is no link between the right to strike and the obligation to work in prison in so far as the prison sentence established in section 288 of the Penal Code applies only in the event of violence, use of force, threats or deception in the course of a strike. It adds that the Bill on the exercise of the right to strike, which needs the consensus of the social partners, has not as yet been enacted.

The Committee takes note of this information. It points out that, although compulsory prison labour carried out under certain conditions does constitute an exception to forced labour within the meaning of Convention No. 29, in certain circumstances compulsory prison labour can, nevertheless, fall within the scope of Convention No. 105. Where work, including prison work, is exacted, in whatever manner, for expressing political views or views opposed to the established political, social or economic system or for participating in a strike, such work imposed in these specific circumstances constitutes forced labour within the meaning of Convention No. 105. Thus, prison sentences, where they involve compulsory work, fall within the scope of the Convention if they sanction the prohibition on expressing views or opposition or participation in a strike.

The Committee concedes that section 288 of the Penal Code does not directly address the right to strike but aims to penalize such violent behaviour or obstruction of freedom to work as might arise during a collective work stoppage, that is to say a strike. However, in the past, the courts have construed these provisions broadly, so that they have enabled strikers whose conduct has been peaceful to be punished. The Committee recalls that a worker having carried out a strike in a peaceful manner may not be liable to penal sanctions, and that in no case may he or she incur a prison sentence. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the courts have had recourse to provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code recently and if so to specify the conduct that they have sanctioned and the penalties they have imposed. Please provide copies of court decisions handed down to enable the Committee to assess the scope of these provisions and thus satisfy itself that no prison sentences involving an obligation to work can be imposed on workers who exercise their right to strike peacefully.

Myanmar

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1955)

Historical background

1. In its earlier comments, the Committee discussed in detail the history of this extremely serious case, which has involved the Government's long-standing, persistent non-observance of the Convention, as well as the failure by the Government to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, appointed by the Governing Body in March 1997 under article 26 of the Constitution. The continued failure by the Government to comply with these recommendations and the observations of the Committee of Experts, as well as other matters arising from the discussion in the other bodies of the ILO, led to the unprecedented exercise of article 33 of the Constitution by the Governing Body at its 277th Session in March 2000, followed by the adoption of a resolution by the Conference at its June 2000 session.

2. The Committee recalls that the Commission of Inquiry, in its conclusions on the case, pointed out that the Convention was violated in national law and in practice in a widespread and systematic manner. In its recommendations, the Commission urged the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure:

- (1) that the relevant legislative texts, in particular the Village Act and the Towns Act, be brought into line with the Convention;
- (2) that in actual practice, no more forced or compulsory labour be imposed by the authorities, in particular the military; and
- (3) that the penalties which may be imposed under section 374 of the Penal Code for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour be strictly enforced.

The Commission of Inquiry emphasized that, besides amending the legislation, concrete action needed to be taken immediately to bring an end to the exaction of forced labour in practice, in particular by the military.

3. In its earlier comments, the Committee of Experts has identified four areas in which measures should be taken by the Government to achieve the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. In particular, the Committee indicated the following measures:

- issuing specific and concrete instructions to the civilian and military authorities;
- ensuring that the prohibition of forced labour is given wide publicity;
- providing for the budgeting of adequate means for the replacement of forced or unpaid labour; and
- ensuring the enforcement of the prohibition of forced labour.

Developments since the Committee's previous observation

4. There have been a number of discussions and conclusions by ILO bodies, as well as further documentation received by the ILO, which has been considered by the Committee. In particular, the Committee notes the following information:

- the discussions and conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards during the 97th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 2008;
- the documents submitted to the Governing Body at its 301st and 303rd Sessions (March and November 2008), as well as the discussions and conclusions of the Governing Body during those sessions;
- the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication received in September 2008 together with the detailed appendices of more than 600 pages; and
- the reports of the Government of Myanmar received on 4 and 20 March, 2 and 19 June, 26 September and 31 October 2008.

The Supplementary Understanding of 26 February 2007 – extension of the complaints mechanism

5. In its previous observation, the Committee discussed the significance of the Supplementary Understanding (SU) of 26 February 2007, which supplemented the earlier Understanding of 19 March 2002 concerning the appointment of an ILO Liaison Officer in Myanmar, and the role of the Liaison Officer in its implementation, as an important new development and a subject of major discussion in ILO bodies. As the Committee previously noted, the SU provides for a new complaints mechanism to be established and put into operation, and has as its prime object “to formally offer the possibility to victims of forced labour to channel their complaints through the services of the Liaison Officer to the competent authorities with a view to seeking remedies available under the relevant legislation”. The Committee notes that the complaints mechanism was extended on 26 February 2008 on a trial basis for one year, until 25 February 2009 (ILC, 97th Session, Provisional Record No. 19, Part 3, Doc. D.5). The Committee further discusses the SU below, in the context of its comments on the other documentation, discussions and conclusions regarding this case.

Discussion and conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

6. The Committee on the Application of Standards once again discussed this case in a special sitting during the 97th Session of the Conference in June 2008 (ILC, 97th Session, Provisional Record No. 19, Part 3). The Conference Committee observed that, although certain steps had been taken in the application of the SU, “much more needed to be done with commitment and urgency”. The Conference Committee expressed its concern that awareness of the existence of the complaints mechanism under the SU “remained very low”, and it urged the Government to give early approval to the translation, in all local languages, of an easily understandable brochure, for wide public distribution, explaining the law and the procedure for lodging a complaint under the SU. The Conference Committee noted that, although the complaints mechanism continued to operate, penalties were not being imposed under the Penal Code, and no criminal convictions of members of the armed forces had taken place. The Conference Committee also emphasized that it was critical that the ILO Liaison Officer had sufficient resources available to undertake his responsibilities, and it underlined the urgent need for the Government to accept a strengthened network of facilitators to deal with complaints from all over the country. The Conference Committee also noted with concern the reported cases of retaliation and harassment against complainants and volunteer facilitators who cooperated with the Liaison Officer, and it called on the Government to ensure that all retaliation and harassment, based on any legal or other pretext, cease with immediate effect and that the perpetrators be punished with the full force of the law.

Discussions in the Governing Body

7. The Committee notes from the report submitted to the 303rd Session of the Governing Body in November 2008 (GB.303/8/2), regarding the progress of the SU complaints mechanism that, as of 6 November 2008, the Liaison Officer had received 121 complaints (GB.303/8/2, paragraph 3). Of those complaints, 70 had been formally submitted for investigation and appropriate action to the Government Working Group on Forced Labour. Of the cases submitted, 50 had been responded to in a manner considered satisfactory and were subsequently closed, while 20 cases were either still awaiting government response or remained open while the process continued. Thirty-nine of the cases submitted involved individual complaints of under-age recruitment into the military (GB.303/8/2, paragraph 3).

8. The Committee notes in the same report to the Governing Body the indications of the Liaison Officer that it was evident that awareness levels among a large majority of the population regarding their right and possibility to complain were very low; that this low level of awareness together with the physical difficulties of actually lodging a complaint meant that the complaints facility currently did not reach out significantly beyond Yangon and neighbouring divisions (paragraph 9); that “extensive negotiations” were continuing to take place on the translation of the SU and the original Understanding of 2002 and final approval had yet to be granted (paragraph 8); and that the Government had yet to consider or approve the text of a simply worded brochure to be translated into local languages, for wide public distribution, explaining the law and the procedure for lodging a complaint under the SU (paragraph 9).

9. In its conclusions (GB.303/8), the Governing Body, inter alia, stressed the urgency of giving full effect to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and to the subsequent decisions of the International Labour Conference (paragraph 1). While recognizing a certain degree of cooperation to make the SU complaints mechanism function, it expressed its continued concern about the slow pace of progress and the urgent need for much more to be done (paragraph 2). The Governing Body underlined the urgent need to raise the awareness of military and civil authorities, as well as the general public, concerning the legislation prohibiting forced labour and the rights contained in the SU. It also pointed out that those guilty of exacting forced labour, including under-age recruitment into the military, must be prosecuted and meaningfully punished, and victims must be entitled to reparation (paragraph 3). It emphasized the need for the Liaison Officer to be able to carry out his functions effectively throughout the country, and for public access to the ILO Liaison Office to be unhindered and free from the fear of reprisals (paragraph 4). Finally, the Governing Body called for an end to the harassment and detention of persons exercising their rights under the SU (paragraph 5).

Communication received from the International Trade Union Confederation

10. The Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC in its communication received in September 2008. Appended to this communication were 49 documents, amounting to more than 600 pages, containing extensive and detailed documentation referring to the persistence of widespread forced labour practices by civil and military authorities. In many cases, the documentation refers to specific dates, detailed locations and circumstances, and specific civil bodies, military units and individual officials. It includes allegations of government-imposed compulsory labour taking place in all but one of the 14 states and divisions of the country. Specific incidents referred to involve allegations of a wide variety of types of work and services requisitioned by the authorities, including work directly related to the military or militia groups (portering, construction and maintenance of military camps, other tasks for the benefit of the military such as human minesweeping and sentry/security duty, and forced recruitment of children and of prisoners upon completion of their sentences), as well as work of a more general nature, including work in agriculture (such as forced cultivation of castor oil nuts), construction and maintenance of roads, bridges, and dams, and other infrastructure work.

11. The ITUC documentation includes translated copies of 59 written orders from military and other authorities to village authorities in Karen and Chin States, containing a range of demands, entailing in most cases a requisition for compulsory (and uncompensated) labour. The information also includes reports of allegations that persons turning to the ILO Liaison Office to file complaints of forced labour often face retaliation and harassment. One such case involved 20 villagers from Pwint Phyu Township in the Magwe Division who, after filing a complaint of forced labour with the ILO, were questioned five times within one month by local authorities. Another case involved 70 residents from Arakan State, who were questioned by officers of the Military Affairs Security Department of the Labour Ministry after submitting a forced labour complaint to the ILO and were forced to sign a document stating they had been coerced into filing their petition. The ITUC communication also refers to information alleging that forced labour has been exacted by military and local authorities in the Irrawaddy Delta region for reconstruction work in the wake of cyclone Nargis in May 2008. It refers, for example, to allegations that: at the Maubin camp for displaced people, 1,500 men and women were forced to work in quarries; that in Ngabyama village in Southern Bogale Township, authorities forced survivors to cut trees and reconstruct roads; and that in Bogalay soldiers were imposing forced labour on local villagers. The documentation also includes testimonies alleging the forced appropriation of money by military commanders from villages in SPDC-controlled areas, allegedly as “donations” being collected for distribution to survivors of the cyclone. A copy of the ITUC’s communication and its annexes was transmitted to the Government on 22 September 2008 for such comments as it may have wished to provide.

The Government’s reports

12. The Committee notes the Government’s reports, referred to in paragraph 4 above. It is grateful for the very lengthy report received on 31 October 2008, which is in large part a compilation of information the Government previously supplied, but which also includes a lengthy summary of the history of developments in this case from the Government’s point of view with an emphasis on its history of cooperation with the International Labour Office, as well as several pages of updated information concerning measures which, according to the Government, are being taken to implement the June 2008 conclusions of the Conference Committee, as well as this Committee’s observations. The Committee notes, however, that in its most recent reports, the Government did not respond in detail to the numerous specific allegations contained in the communication from the ITUC referred to above, other than to provide information about the status of several court cases involving the criminal prosecution and punishment of persons who were acting as volunteer facilitators for the SU complaints mechanism or who were labour activists with links to the ILO or engaged in associational activities aimed at promoting labour rights. These cases have also been matters of particular concern to ILO supervisory bodies. The Committee notes that the information about these cases contained in the Government’s most recent report is a repetition of the information included in the reports received on and before 19 June 2008. The Committee notes the updated information on these cases in the report of the Liaison Officer of 7 November 2008 submitted to the 303rd Session of the Governing Body (GB.303/8/2). The Committee urges the Government to respond in detail in its next report to the numerous specific allegations of continued, widespread imposition of forced or compulsory labour by military and civil authorities throughout the country, which are documented in the recent communication from the ITUC.

Assessment of the situation

Issuing specific and concrete instructions to the civilian and military authorities

13. The Committee notes initially that in its latest reports the Government has given no indication that it has taken measures to formally repeal the relevant provisions of the Village Act and the Towns Act. With regard to Order No. 1/99 as supplemented by the Order of 27 October 2000, which prohibit forced labour, the Government repeats its reference to instructions it states had previously been issued, yet once again it has not supplied details as to the content of those instructions. The Committee notes the reference to a lecture to deputy township judges on 18 February 2008, delivered jointly at an “On-Job Training Course No. 18” by the Director-General of the Department of Labour and the ILO Liaison Officer, which was aimed at raising those participants’ awareness “about forced labour broadly” and to enable them to “make right decisions”. The Committee also notes that the report of the Liaison Officer submitted to the Conference Committee in June 2008 referred to the first of two five-day training for trainers’ courses, led by the Assistant to the Liaison Officer, in association with UNICEF and the ICRC, which it states had been successfully completed. Its 37 participants were officers and non-commissioned officers of the Recruitment Regiment, the Basic Training Camps, and personnel of the Social Welfare Department, and the second programme of this kind was scheduled for the last week of June and was to be followed by the participants leading multiplier training courses around the country (ILC, 97th Session, Provisional Record No. 19, Part 3, doc. D.5, paragraph 7). The Committee notes the information in the Government’s reports received on 20 March and 26 September 2008, on activities undertaken by the Committee for the Prevention of Military Recruitment of Under-age Children. This information also refers to a plan for “multiplier courses” on measures for the prevention of child recruitment into the military to be given to military officers and lower ranking trainees at a number of military training centres during 2008. It indicates, inter alia, that in June 2008 representatives of the Committee for the Prevention of Military Recruitment of Under-age Children and the Ministry of Defence issued “guidance” to assistant judge advocates-general and to department heads of division and regional commands and military training schools, which, in turn, was intended to support “legal education” lectures on the prevention of recruitment of children into the military that were to be given to military officers and lower ranking military personnel at a number of regiments and units. The Committee notes that in its latest reports the Government provided no further information about the plans for multiplier courses or legal education lectures referred to earlier.

14. The Committee considers that steps taken to issue instructions to civilian and military authorities on the prohibition of forced and compulsory labour, such as those referred to above, are vital and need to be intensified. However, given the continued dearth of information regarding such measures, including the detailed content of materials referred to, the Committee remains unable to ascertain that clear instructions have been effectively conveyed to all civil authorities and military units, and that bona fide effect has been given to the orders. The Government has provided no information that would support an observation that, in actual practice, recourse to forced or compulsory labour by the authorities, and in particular the military, has declined on account of instructions regarding the prohibition of forced labour, which the Government indicates has been conveyed to them. The Committee stresses that in order for the Government to eradicate forced labour, the activities referred to above are vital and need to take place on a larger scale and in a more systematic way. The Committee requests the Government to report in greater detail on these activities, including the full content of the materials and curricula utilized, as well as information about their effectiveness in bringing about a decline, in actual practice, in the imposition of forced or compulsory labour.

15. In its previous observation the Committee expressed the hope that the Government would also bring constitutional clarity to the prohibition of forced labour. In its latest report, the Government states that application of the Convention has “been included in the New State Constitution”, which was approved in a constitutional referendum in May 2008 and is due to take effect in 2010, and it refers to section 359 (paragraph 15 of Chapter VIII – “Citizenship, Fundamental Rights and Duties of Citizens”) of that instrument, which states: “The State prohibits any form of forced labour except hard labour as a punishment for crime duly convicted and duties assigned thereupon by the State in accord with the law in the interests of the people.” The Committee, referring also to paragraph 42 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, recalls that, for purposes of the Convention, certain forms of compulsory work or service, which would otherwise fall under the general definition of “forced or compulsory labour”, are expressly excluded from its scope by Article 2(2) of the Convention, and that these exceptions are subject to the observance of certain conditions which define their limits. The Committee notes with regret that the exemption from the prohibition of forced labour in the new Constitution for “duties assigned thereupon by the State in accord with the law in the interests of the people” encompasses permissible forms of forced labour that exceed the scope of the specifically defined exceptions in Article 2(2). The Committee also expresses deep concern about the fact that the Government not only failed to repeal legislative texts identified by the Commission of Inquiry and this Committee, but also included in the text of the Constitution a provision which may be interpreted in such a way as to allow a generalized exaction of forced labour from the population. Moreover, as the Committee pointed out in paragraph 67 of its General Survey referred to above, even those constitutional provisions which expressly prohibit forced or compulsory labour may become inoperative where forced or compulsory labour is imposed by legislation itself. The Committee therefore trusts that the Government will at long last take the necessary steps to amend or repeal the relevant legislative texts, in particular the Village Act and the Towns Act, and that it will also amend paragraph 15 of Chapter VIII of the new Constitution, in order to bring its law into conformity with the Convention.

Ensuring that the prohibition of forced labour is given wide publicity

16. In relation to ensuring that the prohibition of forced labour is given wide publicity, the Committee notes the indication from the report of the Liaison Officer dated 7 November 2008, which was submitted to the Governing Body at its 303rd Session, that since March 2008, the Liaison Officer had undertaken two joint awareness-raising missions with senior Department of Labour officials (GB.303/8/2, paragraph 6). The Government appears to refer in its report received on 31 October 2008 to the same activities, indicating that joint field visits were planned by the Director General of the Department of Labour and the ILO Liaison Officer to Myitkyinar and Monywa in late October 2008 to carry out awareness-raising workshops. The Committee reiterates its view that such activities are critical in helping to ensure that the prohibition of forced labour is widely known and applied in practice, and they should continue and be expanded. It notes the indication of the Liaison Officer in his report to the Governing Body (GB.303/8/2), that there still had been no response to repeated calls from ILO supervisory bodies for a widely publicized, high-level statement reconfirming the Government’s commitment to the elimination of forced labour (paragraph 10).

17. In its previous observation the Committee noted that the complaints mechanism of the SU in itself provided an opportunity to the authorities to demonstrate that continued recourse to the practice is illegal and would be punished as a penal offence, as required by the Convention. In that vein, the Committee notes with concern the statements of the Liaison Officer about the continued shortcomings of the SU in his latest report to the Governing Body (GB.303/8/2), which are referred to above in the discussion of the Governing Body proceedings. The Committee hopes that the Government will, without further delay, take measures to intensify and expand the scale and scope of its efforts to give wide publicity to and raise public awareness about the prohibition of forced labour, including the use of the SU complaints mechanism as an important modality of awareness raising, and that in its next report it will provide information about such measures as well as the impact they are having on the enforcement of criminal penalties against perpetrators of forced labour and on the imposition in actual practice of forced or compulsory labour, particularly by the military.

Providing for the budgeting of adequate means for the replacement of forced or unpaid labour

18. In this regard, the Committee recalls that in its recommendations the Commission of Inquiry stated that: “(A)ction must not be limited to the issue of wage payment; it must ensure that nobody is compelled to work against his or her will. Nonetheless, the budgeting of adequate means to hire free wage labour for the public activities which are today based on forced and unpaid labour is also required.” The Committee, in its previous observations, has also stressed that budgeting of adequate means for the replacement of forced labour, which tends also to be unpaid, is necessary if recourse to the practice is to end. The Committee notes that, in its latest reports, the Government provides no new information, stating as it has previously that it “provides the budget allotment including labour costs for all the Ministries to implement their respective projects”, and “to confirm that the budgetary allotment for the workers are already allocated to the respective Ministry”. The Committee repeats its earlier request for the Government, in its next report, to provide precise, detailed information about the measures it has taken to budget for adequate means for the replacement of forced or unpaid labour.

Ensuring the enforcement of the prohibition of forced labour

19. With regard to the enforcement of prohibitions of forced labour, the Committee notes the assessment of the Liaison Officer, as reported to the Governing Body in November of 2008, that: “In the main, complaints lodged (under the SU) have been dealt with expeditiously by the Government Working Group” (GB.303/8/2, paragraph 5); and that: “The Government’s response to the complaints mechanism at senior level remains reasonably positive” (GB.303/8/2, paragraph 20). However, in its previous observation the Committee expressed its concern that only one case forwarded by the Liaison Officer to the authorities for investigation and appropriate action had so far resulted in the prosecution of those responsible (Case No. 001, which led to the prosecution of two civilian officials), and there were no indications that, in the cases forwarded which involved allegations against military personnel, any action, criminal or even administrative (other than reprimands), had been taken against any military personnel. The Committee notes that this situation remained largely unchanged in 2008, except for three cases against military personnel, referred to in the report of 7 November 2008 submitted to the 303rd Session of the Governing Body, in which fines (28 days’ and one 14 days’ salary; in one case loss of one year’s seniority) rather than reprimands were imposed (GB.303/8/2, paragraph 7). The Committee notes in the same report the statements of the Liaison Officer that administrative penalties against military personnel continue to be proportionately lighter than those imposed on their civilian counterparts, and that, during the period following the submission of previous reports to the ILO supervisory bodies, no further prosecutions of alleged perpetrators under either the Penal Code or military regulations, resulting in imprisonment, had taken place (GB.303/8/2, paragraph 7).

20. The Government has in its latest reports provided no new information about any prosecutions against perpetrators of forced labour being pursued in the court system outside the framework of the SU complaints mechanism. The Committee notes that, in its report received on 31 October 2008, the Government makes reference, as in previous years, to a mechanism that has been put in place for the public to register complaints directly with law enforcement authorities, and it also refers, as it has previously, to an appendix containing a table of cases with notations indicating that in 2003 and 2004 ten cases involving complaints of forced labour were filed directly in the Myanmar courts, several of which resulted in convictions and the imposition in January and February of 2005 of prison sentences under section 374 of the Penal Code. The Committee previously noted these cases in its observation published in its 2005 report. The Committee notes that three of the cases were dismissed, and in the remaining cases the persons convicted and sentenced were all civil administration officials, despite the fact that at least two of the cases involved allegations against military personnel.

21. The Committee emphasizes once again that the illegal exaction of forced labour must be punished as a penal offence, rather than treated as an administrative issue, and the penalties which may be imposed under section 374 of the Penal Code for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour be strictly enforced, in conformity with Article 25 of the Convention. As emphasized by the Commission of Inquiry, this requires thorough investigation, prosecution and adequate punishment of those found guilty, including cases involving military personnel.

Concluding remarks

22. The Committee fully endorses the conclusions concerning Myanmar of the Governing Body and the general evaluation of the forced labour situation by the Liaison Officer. In the light of these conclusions and evaluation, the Committee continues to believe that the only way that genuine and lasting progress in the elimination of forced labour can be made is for the Myanmar authorities to demonstrate unambiguously their commitment to achieving that goal. This requires, beyond the agreement of the SU, that the authorities redouble their efforts to establish the necessary conditions for the successful functioning of the complaint mechanism, and that they take without further delay the long-overdue steps to repeal the relevant provisions of domestic legislation and adopt the appropriate legislative and regulatory framework to give effect to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The Committee trusts that the Government will demonstrate its commitment to rectify the violations of the Convention identified by the Commission of Inquiry, by implementing the very explicit practical requests addressed by the Committee to the Government, and that all the required steps will be taken to achieve compliance with the Convention, both in law and in practice, so that the most serious and long-standing problem of forced labour will be finally resolved.

Nigeria

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views. 1. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Public Order Act, Cap. 382, Laws of the Federation of Nigeria, 1990, which contains provisions imposing certain restrictions on the organization of public assemblies, meetings and processions (sections 1–4), offences being punishable with imprisonment (sections 3 and 4(5)), which involves compulsory prison labour. The Committee recalled that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system.

The Committee also refers in this connection to paragraphs 154 and 162 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, where it observed that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. But sanctions involving compulsory labour fall within the scope of the Convention where they enforce a prohibition of the peaceful expression of views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system. Since opinions and views opposed to the established system are often expressed at various kinds of meetings and assemblies, restrictions affecting the organization of such meetings and assemblies may give rise to similar problems of the application of the Convention, if such restrictions are enforceable with penalties involving compulsory labour.

While noting the Government's statement in the report that the Public Order Act, Cap. 382, does not impose restrictions on the organization of public assemblies by workers for trade union activities and there is therefore no conviction for violation, the Committee observes, however, that the above Act still imposes restrictions on the freedom of expression enforceable with sanctions involving compulsory labour, which is incompatible with the Convention.

The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken in order to bring the provisions of the Public Order Act into conformity with the Convention. While having noted the Government's indication in its previous report that there was no record of the violation of the provisions of the Act, the Committee reiterates its hope that, pending the amendment, the Government will continue to provide information on its application in practice, including information on convictions for violation of its provisions and on penalties imposed.

2. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Nigerian Press Council (Amendment) Act, 2002, which imposes certain restrictions on journalists' activities enforceable with penalties of imprisonment (section 19(1) and (5)(a)), which involves compulsory prison labour. While having noted the Government's repeated indication in its reports that no conviction has been made under the Act, and referring also to the explanations in point 1 of this observation, the Committee reiterates its hope that measures will be taken to repeal or amend these provisions in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. Pending the amendment, the Government is requested to continue to provide information on the application of these provisions in practice, indicating, in particular, any convictions under the above Act and penalties imposed.

Article 1(c) and (d). Punishment for breaches of labour discipline and for participation in strikes. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the following provisions enforceable with sanctions of imprisonment (which involves compulsory prison labour):

- section 81(1)(b) and (c) of the Labour Decree, 1974, under which a court may direct fulfilment of a contract of employment and posting of security for the due performance of so much of the contract as remains unperformed, and a person failing to comply with such direction may be committed to prison;
- section 117(b), (c) and (e) of the Merchant Shipping Act, under which seafarers are liable to imprisonment for breaches of labour discipline even in the absence of a danger to the safety of the ship or of persons;
- section 17(2)(a) of the Trade Disputes Act, Cap. 432, of 1990, under which participation in strikes may be punished with imprisonment.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indications that all these provisions were under consideration by the National Labour Advisory Council. It also noted the Government's indication in its 2005 report that the review of the labour laws had been completed and submitted to the federal Government for further action. In its latest report, the Government states that the provisions referred to above have been addressed in the Collective Labour Relations Bill. The Committee expresses the firm hope that all of the legislative provisions referred to above will soon be amended, so as to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will indicate, in its next report, the progress achieved in this regard.

Pakistan

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes with regret that no comments have been received from the Government in reply to the following communications received from the organizations of workers, which contain observations concerning the application of the Convention by Pakistan: communications dated 31 August and 19 September 2006 received from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (now – the International Trade Unions Confederation (ITUC)), communication dated 30 March 2007 received from the All Pakistan Federation of United Trade Unions (APFUTU) and communication dated 2 May 2007 received from the Pakistan Workers Federation (PWF). The Committee previously noted that the above communications were sent to the Government, in September and October 2006 and in May and June 2007, for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. The Committee also notes two new communications received from the ITUC (dated 29 August 2008) and PWF (dated 21 September 2008), which were sent to the Government, in September and October 2008, for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. The Committee hopes that the Government will not fail to supply its comments in its next report, so as to enable the Committee to examine them at its next session.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

I. Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention

A. Debt bondage

1. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted the difficulties in the implementation of the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act (BLSA), 1992. The Committee notes the communications from the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU) and the All Pakistan Trade Union Federation (APTUF) dated 26 April 2005 and 14 May 2005, respectively, which contain comments on the observance of the Convention and which were forwarded to the Government in June and July 2005 for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. Among other things, the APTUF observed that the BLSA was not being implemented, and the APTUF similarly observed that laws, including those concerning bonded labour, were not being enforced due to the absence of adequate labour inspection machinery. Since no comments from the Government on these communications have been received to date, the Committee hopes the Government will provide them in its next report.

2. The Committee notes the National Policy and Plan of Action for the Abolition of Bonded Labour and Rehabilitation of Freed Bonded Labourers of 2001, which the Government communicated in its latest report. The Committee notes that under the plan of action, a National Committee for the Abolition and Rehabilitation of Bonded Labour was to be established to coordinate the implementation of the plan, with the specific functions of:

- reviewing the implementation of the BLSA and of the action plan;
- monitoring the work of the district-level vigilance committees set up under section 15 of the BLSA and the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Rules, 1995; and
- addressing concerns of national and international bodies on bonded and forced labour issues.

The Committee notes the statement by the Ministry of Labour in its 2005 draft Labour Protection Policy, that the 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action “clearly establishes the intentions and commitment of Government to implement in full” the Convention. The Committee further notes, however, the statement of the Ministry of Labour in its document, “Labour Policy, 2002”, dated 23 September 2002, that the targets and activities set out in the 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action “need to be actively implemented”.

Implementation of National Policy and Plan of Action for the Abolition of Bonded Labour

3. The Committee notes that in its latest report the Government specifies recent initiatives against bonded labour it is taking or contemplating, apparently within the framework of its 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action, including:

- establishment of a Legal Aid Service Unit in the Labour Departments of Punjab and NWFP with a toll free help line to provide legal advice and assistance to needy bonded labourers, with a plan envisaged to hire legal experts to provide legal assistance;
- launching a scheme to construct low-cost housing for freed bonded labour families in the agricultural sector of Sindh, which will provide shelter to these families and contribute to their rehabilitation;
- organizing training workshops for key district government officials and other concerned stakeholders to enhance their capacity and enable them to draw up district-level plans to identify bonded labourers and activate the district vigilance committees; and
- incorporating the issue of bonded labour into the syllabi of judicial, police and civil service academies, in order to help sensitize judicial, law enforcement, and civil service officials to the problem, and holding capacity-building seminars.

4. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, under the BLSA, inspection functions in the area of bonded labour have been assigned to the regular labour inspectorate, as well as to local government heads/officials and police departments. The Committee also notes from the 2001 action plan document, that the fund mandated by the BLSA Rules had been established and an initial deposit of 100 million rupees had been made. The Government, in its report received in January 2005 (on the application of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105)), indicates that work has started on making the Bonded Labour Fund functional, and that a project manual was being prepared to provide guidelines to executing agencies for preparing project proposals for financing.

5. While recognizing these government initiatives to try and combat bonded labour, the Committee hopes that necessary measures are being taken or envisaged to ensure the effective implementation of the 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action for the Abolition of Bonded Labour and Rehabilitation of Freed Bonded Labourers. The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will provide detailed information on progress made and practical results achieved, including copies of relevant reports on all of the activities, projects, institutions and mandates referred to in the action plan. The Committee further asks that the Government provide information clarifying the present status of the district vigilance committees as well as their role in, and relationship to, the labour inspection process, and that it supply information about actions that both the district magistrates and vigilance committees are taking to ensure the effective implementation of the BLSA and the fulfilment of their other functions as mandated under the BLSA and the 1995 rules, such information to include copies of monitoring/evaluation reports prepared by the National Committee for the Abolition and Rehabilitation of Bonded Labour.

Special programme of action to combat forced/bonded labour

6. The Committee in its report (on the application of Convention No. 105), received in January 2005, the Government indicates that since mid-2002 it has been carrying out a special Programme of Action to Combat Forced/Bonded Labour with technical assistance from the ILO. The Government indicates that under the programme the ILO was, among other things, to provide training on human rights and bonded labour concerns to the District Nazims, members of the vigilance committees, and judicial and law enforcement officials; to assist the Government in developing partnerships with stakeholders, employers, and workers; to provide advice on the creation of a high-level national body to combat forced labour; and to assist it in launching demonstration projects to test the feasibility of approaches adopted to tackle the problem. The Committee asks that, in its next report, the Government provide more detailed and comprehensive information concerning this programme and its implementation, including copies of the most recent reports evaluating programme activities and outcomes.

Debt bondage: Data-gathering measures to ascertain the current nature and scope of the problem.

7. The Committee notes that under the 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action a national survey to ascertain the extent of bonded labour was to have been undertaken by January 2002, yet it notes the Government's indication in its latest report that no such quantitative survey has yet been carried out to measure the quantum of the problem in the country.

8. The Committee notes a 2004 report of an initiative of the Ministry of Labour and the ILO, entitled "Rapid Assessment Studies of Bonded Labour in Different Sectors in Pakistan", which contains findings and conclusions from a series of rapid assessment studies conducted from October 2002 to January 2003 by teams of social scientists and researchers under the auspices of the Bonded Labour Research Forum (BLRF), the aim of which was to explore the existence and nature of bonded labour in ten sectors – namely, agriculture, construction, carpet weaving, brick making, marine fisheries, mining, glass bangles, tanneries, domestic work, and begging – and to seek preliminary conclusions. The project represented the first phase of a larger research programme and was intended to lay the groundwork for detailed sector studies and a national survey to determine the incidence of bonded labour across the country, as foreseen in the Government's National Plan of Action. The rapid assessment studies focused primarily on debt bondage but also explored other forms of bonded and forced labour without debt.

9. The Committee notes the conclusion in the report that the findings in "the sectors covered ... yield fresh insights into the workings of the peshgi (advance payments) system and its possible relationship with bonded labour and other coercive labour arrangements". The correlation was found to be "relatively weak" in some sectors but present in others. The report also emphasizes the findings that there exist "other forms of labour bonding and coercion ... not clearly associated with the peshgi system".

10. The Committee reiterates its hope that the Government, as a follow-up to the preliminary part of the research programme noted above and in accordance with the mandate of its 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action, will undertake a statistical survey on bonded labour throughout the country, using a valid methodology in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations and with human rights organizations and institutions, and that it will supply information on the progress achieved in this connection.

Bonded labour in agriculture

11. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the Government's view that there are built-in deficiencies in its labour laws on dealing with labour engaged in the agricultural sector. The Committee asks once again that the Government supply further information on the issue, as well as information on measures taken or envisaged to remedy the situation, in the context of the eradication of bonded labour in agriculture.

B. Trafficking in persons

12. The Committee notes the promulgation of the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, 2002 (PCHTO), which entered into force in October 2002. Among other things, the ordinance criminalizes "human trafficking", which it defines, in part, as trafficking that entails the use of coercion for the purpose of attaining any benefit or for the purpose of exploitative entertainment, slavery or forced labour (sections 2(h) and 3); makes trafficking offences punishable by sanctions involving sentences of imprisonment of up to seven years and, in cases of trafficking of women, of up to ten years, as well as fines (section 3); provides for special sentences for trafficking offences committed by organized criminal groups (section 4) and for repeated offences (section 5); provides for the payment of compensation and expenses to victims (section 6); and makes trafficking in persons cognizable by the courts as a prosecutable offence (sections 8 and 10). The Committee asks that in its next report the Government supply a copy of the most recent rules and regulations that have been promulgated to implement the PCHTO.

Trafficking in persons. Data-gathering measures to ascertain the current nature and scope of the problem.

13. The Committee notes the 2005 report of the International Organisation for Migration (IOM) entitled, "Data and research on human trafficking: A global survey", which indicates that Pakistan continues to be a major destination country for trafficked women as well as a major transit country of persons trafficked from Bangladesh to Middle Eastern countries, where women are exploited for sexual exploitation. The report indicates that men are seldom viewed as "victims of trafficking" and more often in the context of irregular migration, and that this shortcoming has limited the availability of knowledge and data on trafficking in men in South Asia. The report emphasizes that, while available studies contribute to an understanding of the causes, sources, destinations, and consequences of trafficking, current statistics on trafficking in persons are outdated or anecdotal, and there is an urgent need to carry out comprehensive national baseline surveys with the aim of developing a South Asian database on trafficking in persons. In light of these indications, the Committee hopes that the Government will undertake a national baseline survey on trafficking in persons, in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations as well as other societal organizations and institutions, and that it will supply information on the progress achieved in this connection.

Practical measures aimed at the effective elimination of trafficking in persons.

14. The Committee notes the information concerning the Government's collaboration with the IOM in an action programme on migration issues which includes, as a significant component, the problem of trafficking in persons. The Committee notes that, at the 12th Summit of the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) in Islamabad in January 2004, the Government agreed to the Islamabad Declaration, which among other things calls on member States to "move towards an early ratification" of the SAARC Convention on Preventing and Combating Trafficking in Women and Children for Prostitution, adopted in 2002 (paragraph 19). The Committee also notes that in May 2005, representatives of the Government and other participants at the Fifth South Asia Ministerial Conference adopted the "Islamabad Declaration: Review and Future Action", in which, among other things, they "recognize the gaps and challenges in implementation" in a number of areas, including an inadequate commitment, awareness, measures, and resources to combat violence against women (paragraph 5(g)); and the lack of regional cooperation and partnership initiatives to address problems of regional concerns such as trafficking in women (paragraph 5(q)). The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to develop policies and take measures that are aimed at the effective elimination of trafficking in persons in both law and practice, in conformity with the Convention, and that in its next report it will supply detailed information in this connection.

II. Restrictions on voluntary termination of employment

15. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the information supplied by the Government representative to the Conference Committee in June 1999, according to which an amendment to the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act of 1952, under which government employees who unilaterally terminate their employment without consent from the employer are subject to a term of imprisonment, was to be considered by the tripartite Commission on the Consolidation, Simplification and Rationalization of Labour Laws. The Government indicated in its report of 2000 that the Commission's final report was expected at the end of September 2000. As the Government's latest report contains no new information on this subject, the Committee once again requests the Government to supply a copy of the Commission's report. The Committee expresses its firm hope that the Government will take the necessary steps to bring the federal and provincial essential services Acts into conformity with the Convention and will report on the progress achieved in this regard.

16. The Committee also repeats its request for copies of the full texts of the following Ordinances enacted in 2000: the Removal from Service (Special Powers) Ordinance, No. XVII of 27 May 2000; the Civil Servants (Amendment) Ordinance, No. XX of 1 June 2000; and the Compulsory Service in the Armed Forces (Amendment) Ordinance, No. LXIII of 6 December 2000.

III. Article 25. Adequacy and enforcement of penalties for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour

Enforcement of Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1992.

17. The Committee previously noted the allegations of the ICFTU, contained in its communications of 2001, according to which the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1992 (BLSA) had not been applied in practice, as few officials were willing to implement it for fear of incurring the wrath of the landlords, thus allowing the latter to use forced labour with impunity. Recalling that Article 25 of the Convention provides that the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable by penalties that are really adequate and strictly enforced, the Committee once again requests information on the number of inspections under the BLSA, as well as information about any legal actions taken against employers of bonded labourers, including copies of any court rulings in such cases.

Enforcement of Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance.

18. With regard to enforcement of the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, 2002 (PCHTO), the Committee notes a press statement by the Minister of the Interior in June 2005 that, during the period from 2003 to May 2005, 888 trafficking-related complaints under the PCHTO were registered with the Federal Investigation Agency; that as many as 737 suspected traffickers were arrested; that in 336 of these cases investigations subsequently led to court prosecutions; and that these prosecutions resulted in 85 convictions and four acquittals, with the remaining cases still pending in trial. The Committee also notes from the report of the Prime Minister Secretariat, "One year performance of the Government, August 2004 August 2005", dated 29 August 2005, a section on "Curbing human trafficking" in a chapter entitled "Improving law and order", which states:

The Government through the Federal Investigation Agency has adopted stringent measures to curb human trafficking ... For sustained action against human trafficking, Anti-Trafficking Units (ATUs) have been set up at FIA HQ and in zonal directorates. These outfits are dedicated units for the enforcement of laws relating to prevention of human trafficking to and from Pakistan. To solicit support from the Civil Society, leading NGOs have also been co-opted for information and assistance.

The Committee also notes the indication in the 2005 Annual Report of the Law Division of the Ministry of Law, Justice and Human Rights that, while the Government has promulgated an ordinance to criminalize human trafficking, "a lot needs to be done for effective implementation of that ordinance".

19. The Committee asks that in its next report the Government provide updated information on the enforcement of the PCHTO, including statistics concerning the numbers of trafficking-related complaints registered, individuals arrested, court proceedings initiated, convictions obtained, penalties imposed, and victim compensation awarded, including copies of all relevant court rulings. More generally, it hopes that the Government, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention, will endeavour to both assess whether and ensure that the penalties provided under the PCHTO that punish trafficking are really adequate and will strive to ensure that the PCHTO is strictly enforced, and that it provide information in this connection, including updated information concerning the evolution of the system of anti-trafficking units and assessing its strengths and shortcomings.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

I. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not yet responded to the observations made in 2001 by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (now the International Trade Union Confederation, ITUC), and in 2005 by the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU) concerning the application of the Convention, which were forwarded to the Government in 2001 and 2005 respectively. The Committee also notes a new communication received from the Pakistan Workers' Federation (dated 21 September 2008), which was sent to the Government in October 2008 for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. The Committee hopes that the Government will not fail to supply its comments concerning all the abovementioned communications of workers' organizations in its next report, so as to enable the Committee to examine them at its next session.

II. The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation on the following matters:

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Forced or compulsory labour as punishment for breach of contract or participation in strikes in non-essential services. 1. In earlier comments made under the present Convention and the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Committee has noted that the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act (ESA), 1952, and corresponding provincial Acts, prohibit employees from leaving their employment, even by giving notice, without the consent of the employer, as well as from striking, subject to penalties of imprisonment that may involve compulsory labour. The Committee has also noted previous comments, made under the Convention by the APFTU, according to which the Government has applied provisions of the ESA to workers employed in non-essential services, including various public utilities such as the Water and Power Distribution Authority (WAPDA), the Karachi Port Trust, and Sui Gas, as well as railways and telecommunications, and these workers cannot resign from their service and cannot go on strike.

2. The Committee notes the indication of the Worker member of Pakistan, in the Conference Committee at the 90th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 2002, that management in the Karachi Electric Supply Corporation, and in the telecommunications and railway industries generally, had been making use of the provisions of the ESA to prevent workers from presenting their legitimate demands and to refuse any type of social dialogue. He referred in particular to workers in Quetta who had gone on strike and been arrested. The Committee also notes, from the APFTU communication dated 26 April 2005, the indication that the provisions of the ESA continue to be applied to ban strikes in non-essential services.

3. The Committee notes the indications by the Government representative in the Conference Committee in June 2002 that, while that the Act has remained on the books, that most public sector organizations to which the ESA was applied were undergoing privatization, including WAPDA and the telecommunications and oil and gas sectors, and that the Act would therefore no longer be applicable when those organizations had been fully privatized. The Committee notes from its latest report the Government's indication, which it has repeated for a number of years, that the provisions of the ESA are applied restrictively.

4. The Committee points out once again, with reference to the explanations provided in paragraphs 110 and 123 of its General Survey of 1979 on the abolition of forced labour, that the Convention does not protect persons responsible for breaches of labour discipline or strikes that impair the operation of essential services in the strict sense or in other circumstances where life and health are in danger; however, in such cases there must exist an effective danger, not mere inconvenience. Furthermore, all the workers concerned – whether in any employment under the federal and provincial governments and local authorities or in public utilities, including essential services – must remain free to terminate their employment by reasonable notice; otherwise, a contractual relationship based on the will of the parties is changed into service by compulsion of law, which is incompatible with both the present Convention and the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), likewise ratified by Pakistan. The Committee also recalls that, in its comments to the Government on its application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), it has observed that the ESA includes services which cannot be considered essential in the strict sense of the term, including, among others, oil production, postal services, railways, airways, and ports, and it has for some time requested that the Government amend the ESA so as to ensure that its scope is limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee refers the Government to its comments under Convention No. 87 on this point. It reiterates its firm hope that the ESA, and corresponding provincial Acts, will be repealed or amended in the near future so as to ensure the observance of the Convention, and that the Government will report on the action taken to this effect.

5. In comments made for many years, the Committee has referred to sections 54 and 55 of the Industrial Relations Ordinance (No. XXIII of 1969), under which, whoever commits any breach of any term of any settlement, award or decision or fails to implement any such term may be punished with imprisonment which may involve compulsory labour. The Committee notes the promulgation of the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) of 2002, which has repealed the 1969 Ordinance (section 80). The Committee notes with interest, from the indications of the Government in its latest report, as well as the text of sections 65, 66, and 67 of the IRO, that the penalties of imprisonment have been eliminated.

Forcible return of seafarers on board ship. 6. The Committee has, from the time of the Government's ratification of the Convention in 1960, referred to sections 100 to 103 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1923, under which penalties involving compulsory labour may be imposed in relation to various breaches of labour discipline by seafarers, and seafarers may be forcibly returned on board ship to perform their duties. The Committee notes the promulgation of the Pakistan Merchant Shipping Ordinance (PMSO), 2001 (No. LII of 2001). It observes that the PMSO still contains provisions, particularly sections 204, 206, 207, and 208, which would permit, in respect of various breaches of labour discipline, such as absence without leave, wilful disobedience, or combining with the crew in "neglect" of duty, the imposition of sanctions involving the forcible conveyance of seafarers on board ship, as well as imprisonment (which may involve compulsory labour by virtue, inter alia, of section 3(26) of the General Clauses Act, 1897). The Committee regrets that, after decades of comments addressed to the Government on this point, the Government has promulgated new legislation without eliminating the divergences between its national legislation and the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Government will amend or repeal without delay those provisions of the 2001 Ordinance that prescribe penalties for breaches of labour discipline under which seafarers may be imprisoned or forcibly returned on board ship to perform their duties. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard. The Government is also asked to provide a copy of the implementing rules or regulations promulgated under section 603 of the 2001 Ordinance.

Article 1(a) and (e). Forced labour as a means of political coercion. 7. In comments made for many years, the Committee has referred to certain provisions in the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952 (sections 10–13), the West Pakistan Press and Publications Ordinance, 1963 (sections 12, 23, 24, 27, 28, 30, 36, 56 and 59) and the Political Parties Act, 1962 (sections 2 and 7), which give the authorities wide discretionary powers to prohibit the publication of views and to order the dissolution of associations, subject to penalties of imprisonment which may involve compulsory labour.

8. The Committee notes the promulgation of the Press, Newspapers, News Agencies and Books Registration Ordinance, 2002, which repeals the West Pakistan Press and Publications Ordinance, 1963 (section 45). Under the registration provisions of the 2002 Ordinance, a District Coordination Officer must deny authentication of a declaration, which must be made as a prerequisite for publication of a newspaper, in cases where the declaration has been filed by a person convicted of a criminal offence involving moral turpitude or for wilful default of public dues (section 10(2)(c)). Where the District Coordination Officer fails to take action to authenticate or to pass an order denying authentication of a declaration within a period of 30 days, the declaration is deemed to be authenticated (section 10(4)). Anyone who, among other things, edits, prints, or publishes a newspaper in contravention of the Ordinance – for instance, without having made a declaration or without having a declaration authenticated – is liable to punishment involving a sanction of imprisonment (which may involve compulsory labour) for a term of up to six months (sections 5 and 28). Referring to paragraph 133 of the General Survey of 1979 on the abolition of forced labour, the Committee asks the Government in its next report to indicate in relation to the abovementioned provisions of the Press, Newspapers, News Agencies and Books Registration Ordinance, 2002, the measures taken or envisaged to ensure, in accordance with Article 1(a) of the Convention, that no form of forced or compulsory labour (including labour exacted as a consequence of a sentence of imprisonment) may be imposed as a means of political coercion or as a punishment for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the application in practice of sections 5, 10(2)(c), 28 and 30 of the Press, Newspapers, News Agencies and Books Registration Ordinance, 2002, including the number of persons arrested and convicted under these provisions, as well as the particulars of any judicial decisions which may serve to define or clarify the effect of the abovementioned provisions. The Government is also requested to supply a copy of the text of any rules promulgated under section 44 of the Ordinance to implement it.

9. As regards the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and the Political Parties Act, 1962, the Committee notes the indications by the Government representative in the Conference Committee in June 2002 that the application of these statutes was extremely restrictive. The Committee also notes from the Annual Reports of 2003 and 2005 of the Government's Law and Justice Commission, as well as its Report No. 56, that the Commission, in response to a Supreme Court ruling, had approved and drafted legislative proposals for certain amendments to be made to the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and that proposed reforms to other legislation, including the Political Parties Act, 1962, were under consideration. The Committee hopes that the concerns of the Committee will be taken into consideration in the work of the Law and Justice Commission. More generally, the Committee hopes that the Government will soon take the necessary measures to bring the abovementioned provisions of the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and the Political Parties Act, 1962, into conformity with the Convention, and that it will report on progress achieved. Pending action to amend these provisions, the Government is requested to supply updated information on their practical application, including the cases registered, the number of convictions, and copies of any relevant court decisions.

10. The Committee notes that, in its latest report, the Government has indicated, with reference to the non-conformity with the Convention of the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952, that “Pakistan is serving in the front line of the war against terrorism and in retaliation the unscrupulous elements off and on try to disrupt the supply chain of oil as well as natural gas to make stand still the whole economy of the country”. It notes the similar indication by the representative of the Government in the Conference Committee in June 2002, with reference to the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and the Political Parties Act, 1962, that Pakistan “was in the forefront of the fight against terrorism and faced very difficult political circumstances”, and that under the present circumstances any change to the existing laws might not be feasible, particularly those related to the security of the country. The Committee observes that these laws, as well as the Merchant Shipping Act, 1923, have been the subject of comments by the Committee ever since the Government ratified the Convention in 1960, and that they have also been the subject of numerous discussions in the Conference Committee. The Committee would also like to point out that, if counter-terrorism legislation responds to the legitimate need to protect the security of the public against the use of violence, it can nevertheless become a means of political coercion and a means of punishing the peaceful exercise of civil rights and liberties, such as the freedom of expression and the right to organize. The Convention protects these rights and liberties against repression by means of sanctions involving compulsory work, and the limits which may be imposed on them by law need to be properly addressed.

11. The Committee hopes that, as a matter of urgency, the Government will at long last take the necessary measures to bring the provisions of the national legislation mentioned above into conformity with the Convention, and that it will report on progress achieved.

The use of forced or compulsory labour as a means of religious discrimination. 12. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to sections 298B(1) and (2) and 298C of the Penal Code, inserted by the Anti-Islamic Activities of Qadiani Group, Lahori Group and Ahmadis (Prohibition and Punishment) Ordinance, No. XX of 1984, under which any person of these groups who uses Islamic epithets, nomenclature and titles is subject to punishment with imprisonment (which may involve compulsory labour) for a term that may extend to three years. The Committee has noted the report submitted to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in 1996 by the Special Rapporteur on the Implementation of the Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief (document E/CN.4/1996/95/Add.1 of 2 January 1996), which indicates that, according to many non-governmental sources, the religious activities of the Ahmadi community are seriously restricted, and that many Ahmadis are reported to be prosecuted under section 298C of the Penal Code (paragraph 41). The Committee has also noted the conclusion of the Special Rapporteur that the State laws related to religious minorities are likely to favour or foster intolerance in society, and that the law applied specifically to the Ahmadi minority is particularly questionable.

13. The Committee has noted the Government’s repeated statements in its reports that religious discrimination does not exist and is forbidden under the Constitution, which guarantees equal citizenship and fundamental rights to minorities living in the country. The Government states that subject to law, public order and morality, the minorities have the right to profess, propagate their religion and establish, maintain and manage their religious institutions. In the Government’s view, the Penal Code imposes equal obligations on all citizens, whatever their religion, to respect the religious sentiments of others, and an act that impinges upon the religious sentiments of other citizens is punishable under the Penal Code. The Government indicates that religious rituals referred to in Ordinance No. XX are prohibited only if exercised in public, whereas if they are performed in private without causing provocation to others, they do not fall under the prohibition.

14. While noting this information, the Committee points out once again, referring also to the explanations provided in paragraphs 133 and 141 of its General Survey of 1979 on the abolition of forced labour, that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. But where punishment involving compulsory labour is aimed at the peaceful expression of religious views, or where such punishment (for whatever offence) is meted out more severely, or even exclusively, to certain groups defined in social or religious terms, this falls within the scope of the Convention. The Committee therefore reiterates that it firmly hopes the necessary measures will be taken in relation to sections 298B and 298C of the Penal Code, so as to ensure the observance of the Convention. Pending action to amend these provisions, the Committee requests that in its next report the Government provide updated and detailed factual information on the practical application of the provisions of sections 298B and 298C of the Penal Code, including a record of cases registered, the number of persons convicted, and copies of court decisions.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Papua New Guinea

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report contains no reply to previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Penal sanctions applicable to seafarers for various breaches of labour discipline. In comments it has been making since 1978, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Seamen (Foreign) Act, 1952, under which a seafarer belonging to a foreign ship who deserts or commits certain other disciplinary offences is liable to imprisonment which involves an obligation to perform labour (section 2(1), (3), (4) and (5)). The Committee also referred to section 1 of the same Act and section 161 of the revised Merchant Shipping Act (chapter 242) (consolidated to No. 67 of 1996), which stipulate that foreign seafarers deserting their ship may be forcibly returned on board ship.

As the Committee repeatedly pointed out, referring also to the explanations in paragraph 179 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, sanctions of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) would only be compatible with the Convention where they are clearly limited to acts endangering the safety of the ship or the life or health of the persons, but not where they relate more generally to breaches of labour discipline, such as desertion, absence without leave or disobedience; similarly, provisions under which seafarers may be forcibly returned on board ship are not compatible with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in the report that numerous requests concerning the Committee's comments have been communicated to the Department of Transport, which is responsible for administering and applying the above legislation, with a view to amending these provisions. It also notes the Government's renewed commitment to review these provisions in connection with the overall revision of the labour legislation being undertaken with ILO technical assistance, as well as the Government's indication that it is hopeful the amendment of these provisions will take place in 2005–06.

While noting these indications, the Committee expresses firm hope that the above provisions of the Seamen (Foreign) Act and the Merchant Shipping Act will soon be brought into conformity with the Convention and asks the Government to report the progress achieved in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Peru

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

Article 1, paragraph 1, and Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Forced labour by indigenous communities. In the observations that it has been making for many years, the Committee has referred to the existence of forced labour practices (slavery, debt bondage and serfdom) affecting members of indigenous communities, particularly in the Atalaya region in sectors such as agriculture, stock-raising and forestry. In its previous observation, the Committee requested information from the Government on the approval and implementation of the Plan of Action for the Eradication of Forced Labour.

Measures taken by the Government. The Committee notes the establishment of the National Commission to Combat Forced Labour, created by Presidential Decree No. 001-2007-TR, of 13 January 2007, the purpose of which is to act as the permanent coordination body for policies and action against forced labour in the various sectors at both the national and regional levels. Under the presidency of the Minister of Labour and Employment Promotion, the Commission is composed, among other members, of representatives of the Ministries of Labour, Health, Education, Agriculture and of employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee notes with interest that Presidential Decree No. 009-2007-TR approved the National Plan to Combat Forced Labour (hereinafter, the "National Plan"), in the context of which the medium- and long-term policies are intended to address structural issues (the conditions of vulnerability of the victims) and the adoption of short-term coordinating measures to resolve specific instances of forced labour. The measures envisaged in the National Plan include: legislative action to specifically criminalize forced labour and to repress such practices; measures to strengthen and train the inspection services; undertaking investigations in sectors in which there are indications of situations of forced labour; developing a communication strategy to inform the population concerning the problem of forced labour and the computerized processing of complaints of cases of forced labour.

Legislative measures. The Committee notes that one of the objectives of the National Plan (component III) is "the existence of legislation in conformity with international standards respecting freedom of work and rules which give legal guarantees for action against forced labour".

The Committee notes the action that has been envisaged in the National Plan and hopes that the Government will provide information on the progress achieved in relation to:

- the formulation and harmonization of the legislation to combat the issue of forced labour;
- the formulation of a draft text to regulate private employment agencies and systems for the training of the labour force, focusing on the prevention of forced labour, and their integration into the mandate of the labour inspectorate;
- the preparation of a study on the viability of establishing standards for work in specific economic activities in which there are indications of forced labour;
- providing ex officio legal defence services free of charge for citizens who have been victims of forced labour, with the criminal prosecution of persons who have actively committed the crime of forced labour.

Inspection. The Committee notes the major role of labour inspection in combating forced labour and that the action envisaged in the National Plan for institutional strengthening in the field of inspection, includes:

- the creation of mobile inspection units in geographical areas that are difficult to access in which forced labour situations have been identified;
- the establishment of machinery to receive complaints and forward them to the corresponding services;
- the inclusion of a module on forced labour in training plans for the staff of the labour inspection system;
- the inclusion of the subject of fundamental labour rights in the curriculum for the police school.

The Committee notes that, among the first actions planned, a bi-national workshop for Peru and Brazil is to be held in the city of Pucallpa-Ucayali, with the participation of specialists from the Brazilian mobile inspection unit. The principal objective of the workshop is to undertake practical action in the region of Ucayali to combat forced labour in the illegal felling of wood. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the conclusions formulated at the bi-national seminar for Peru and Brazil and on the other action envisaged in the National Plan in relation to inspection services.

Research and statistics. Among the measures envisaged to identify the groups affected and the number of victims, the National Plan includes:

- undertaking research on forced labour in specific sectors in which there are indications of situations of forced labour, such as nut harvesting in Madre de Dios, domestic work, fishing and artisanal mining, agriculture and various sectors of production throughout the Peruvian Amazon;
- undertaking regular diagnostic exercises to evaluate the existence or identify evidence of forced labour and its gender dimensions in general terms.

With regard to domestic work under conditions of forced labour, the Committee notes the comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), forwarded to the Government in September 2006. In its comments, the ITUC alleges that elements of forced labour are found in the domestic work sector. Women form a majority of that sector and they live and work in the household of the employer. Employers often keep their identity documents and this makes it impossible for them to leave their jobs. In many cases, they do not receive any remuneration because they are indebted to their employer, who deducts from their wages food, housing, medical fees and the value of any damage caused by such workers, who have to continue working without wages to cover the costs.

The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on the investigations that have been carried out in the sectors envisaged in the National Plan, and particularly on the situation of domestic work and the ITUC's allegations.

Article 25. Penalties for the exaction of forced labour. In its previous observation, the Committee requested information on the number of complaints of cases of forced labour, the progress made in the investigation of these cases, and particularly the percentage of complaints which have given rise to prosecutions and the number of convictions obtained.

In its report, the Government indicates that there is no specific legislation addressing the issue of forced labour in an integral manner and that the State will therefore have to update and harmonize the criminal, labour and civil legislation on this subject. Furthermore, the National Plan envisages the establishment of machinery for complaints and the Ministry of Labour and non-governmental organizations are currently creating computer systems for this purpose. The Government adds that it has no information on prosecutions and convictions for forced labour.

The Committee recalls that, under the terms of Article 25 of the Convention, the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a penal offence and that it shall be an obligation on any Member ratifying the Convention to ensure that penalties imposed by law are really adequate and are strictly enforced. The Committee observes that the lack of specific provisions in criminal law to repress and penalize forced labour prevents effect from being given to this provision of the Convention with the consequence that those responsible for the exaction of forced labour enjoy impunity. Furthermore, the measures envisaged in the National Plan for the establishment of complaints procedures will not be effective as there is no legal basis to incriminate practices of forced labour.

The Committee hopes that the Government will rapidly take the necessary measures to specifically criminalize and repress practices of forced labour in criminal law. In the meantime, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the complaints procedures that have been established and, where appropriate, the complaints that have been made under the current provisions of the national legislation.

The Committee welcomes the action which the Government has taken with a view to the eradication of forced labour. The measures envisaged, while constituting an important first step, will need to be strengthened and lead to systematic action that is commensurate with the scope and gravity of the problem. The direction taken by the National Plan should allow this objective to be achieved. The Committee hopes that each of the components of the National Plan of Action to Combat Forced Labour will be implemented effectively and that the Government will be able to provide information in its next report on the progress made and the results achieved.

Russian Federation

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1956)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. Referring to its earlier comments, the Committee has noted with interest the information provided by the Government concerning measures taken to prevent, suppress and punish trafficking in persons for the purpose of exploitation. It has noted, in particular, the adoption of the Federal Act No. 162-FZ, of 8 December 2003, which introduced amendments to the Criminal Code (insertion of the new sections 127.1 (trafficking in human beings) and 127.2 (exploitation of slave labour)), which define crimes related to trafficking and slave-like practices and provide for severe sanctions of imprisonment. It has also noted the information on the implementation in the Russian Federation of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) Plan of Action to combat trafficking in persons, of the European Union project “Prevention of human trafficking in the Russian Federation” conducted in collaboration with the International Organization for Migration (IOM) and the programme of cooperation between Member States of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) on combating human trafficking for 2007–2010, as well as the information on bilateral cooperation with neighbouring countries in this field. The Committee has noted statistical information concerning persecution of the offences of human trafficking under section 127.1 of the Criminal Code, as well as the information on the court decisions and other information on the law enforcement provided in the report.

As regards the elaboration of a draft Law on Combating Trafficking in Human Beings which should provide for a system of bodies to combat trafficking and contain provisions concerning prevention of trafficking, as well as protection and rehabilitation of victims, to which the Government referred in its previous report, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that the draft text has been finalized and submitted to the State Duma of the Russian Federation.

The Committee would appreciate it if the Government would continue to provide information on the application in practice of section 127.1 of the Criminal Code, supplying sample copies of the relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed on perpetrators, as well as information on the practical measures taken or envisaged to combat trafficking in human beings with a view to eliminating it. Please also keep the ILO informed on progress in the adoption of the draft Law on Combating Trafficking in Human Beings and provide a copy thereof, once it has been adopted.

Sierra Leone

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Compulsory cultivation. Over many years, the Committee has been referring to section 8(h) of the Chiefdom Councils Act (Cap. 61), under which compulsory cultivation may be imposed on “natives”. On numerous occasions, it requested the Government to repeal or amend this provision. The Committee also noted the Government’s statement that the abovementioned section is not in conformity with article 9 of the Constitution and would be held unenforceable.

The Committee takes due note of the Government’s repeated indication that section 8(h) is not applicable in practice and that information on any amendment of this section would be communicated to the ILO in the near future.

As the Government has repeatedly indicated since 1964 that this legislation would be amended, the Committee reiterates firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken in order to bring section 8(h) of the Chiefdom Councils Act into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. It requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Sudan

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1970)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a) and (d) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views and for having participated in strikes. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Penal Code and the Labour Code, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving an obligation to work under the Prison Regulations, Chapter IX, section 94, and the 1997 Regulations concerning the organization of work in prisons, Chapter XIII, section 38(6)) may be imposed in circumstances falling within the scope of the Convention.

The Committee has noted the adoption in 2005 of the Interim National Constitution, which contains the Bill of Rights promoting human rights and fundamental freedoms. It has noted that the declaration of emergency was lifted in July 2005 as a result of signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement. The Committee has also noted the Government’s indication in its report that a draft labour law has been finalized and prepared for submission to the competent authorities for adoption. The Committee asks the Government to supply a copy of the new law, as soon as it is adopted. It also asks the Government once again to supply copies of the legislation in force concerning freedom of association, assembly, and expression of political opinion.

The Committee takes note of the situation regarding human rights in Sudan as described in Decision 2/115 of the UN Human Rights Council concerning Darfur, of 28 November 2006, in the report on the situation of human rights in Darfur prepared by the group of experts mandated by the Human Rights Council resolution 4/8 presided by the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Sudan (A/HRC/5/6, of 8 June 2007) and in the statement issued by the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Sudan, of 6 August 2007. In its Decision 2/115 referred to above, the UN Human Rights Council noted with concern the seriousness of the human rights and humanitarian situation in Darfur and called on all parties to put an immediate end to the ongoing violations of human rights and international humanitarian law. In her statement referred to above, the Special Rapporteur pointed out that, despite the potential for democratic transition and optimism created by the Interim National Constitution and the Bill of Rights, violations of civil and political rights continue, including limitations on freedom of expression. She welcomed the Government's acknowledgement of the seriousness of the situation and strongly encouraged it to take action without delay to improve it, so that people can fully enjoy their human rights and fundamental freedoms.

As the Committee repeatedly pointed out, it observes the importance for the effective respect of the Convention of the legal guarantees regarding freedom of assembly, expression, demonstration and association, and the direct effect which restriction of these rights, both in law and in practice, can have on the application of the Convention.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that, according to the Prison Regulations of 1999, there is no compulsory labour in prisons and work is optional for prisoners. It requests the Government once again to supply a copy of the 1999 Prison Regulations with its next report, so as to enable the Committee to ascertain whether national legislation is compatible with the Convention.

The Committee is addressing a more detailed request on the above matters directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

United Republic of Tanzania

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a), (b) and (c) of the Convention. Penalties involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views, for failure to engage in socially useful work and for various breaches of labour discipline. For many years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Penal Code, the Newspaper Act, the Merchant Shipping Act and the Local Government (District Authorities) Act, under which penalties involving compulsory labour may be imposed in circumstances falling within the scope of the Convention. The Committee also asked the Government to provide information on the amendment or repeal of the provisions of various legal instruments, to which it referred in its comments under Convention No. 29, likewise ratified by the United Republic of Tanzania, and which are contrary to Article 1(b) of this Convention.

The Committee noted the Government's statements in its 2003 and 2004 reports that the Committee's views and comments made on the provisions of the above laws which are incompatible with the Convention had been duly taken into account, and that the identified laws had been addressed by the Task Force of the Labour Law Reform with a view to making appropriate recommendations to the Government. As regards the abovementioned Merchant Shipping Act, the Government indicated in its 2002 report that the International Maritime Organization (IMO) had prepared proposals for the amendment of the Act, which had been submitted to the Government.

The Committee reiterates firm hope that the necessary action will be taken in the near future in order to repeal all provisions incompatible with the Convention, and that the Government will soon be able to report on progress made in this regard.

The Committee is again addressing a more detailed request on the above matters directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Thailand

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1969)

Article 1(c) of the Convention. Sanctions involving compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to sections 131–133 of the Labour Relations Act B.E. 2518 (1975), under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed on any employee who violates or fails to comply with an agreement on terms of employment or a decision on a labour dispute under sections 18, 22–24, 29 and 35(4) of the Labour Relations Act. The Committee pointed out that sections 131–133 of the Labour Relations Act were incompatible with the Convention, which prohibits the use of compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline.

The Committee has noted the Government's statement that the above provisions have been applied in practice only in a few cases. It has also noted the Government's indication in its 2006 report that the Ministry of Labour is planning to conduct a study on the conformity of the Labour Relations Act B.E. 2518 (1975) with the Convention and that the Committee on the national policy for legal reform has been established, with the Prime Minister as the Chairperson.

While having noted this information, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will soon be taken with a view to bringing the above provisions of the Labour Relations Act B.E. 2518 (1975) into conformity with the Convention, either by repealing sanctions involving compulsory labour or by limiting their scope to acts endangering the life or health of persons.

Article 1(d). Sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. 1. The Committee previously referred to the following provisions of the Labour Relations Act B.E. 2518 (1975), under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed for participation in strikes:

- (i) section 140 read in conjunction with section 35(2), if the minister orders the strikers to return to work, being of the opinion that the strike may affect the national economy or cause hardship to the public or endanger national security or be contrary to public order;

- (ii) section 139 read in conjunction with section 34(5), if the matter is awaiting the decision of the Labour Relations Committee or a decision has been given by the minister under section 23(1), (2), (6) or (8) or by the Labour Relations Committee under section 24.

The Committee has noted the Government's statement that the provisions of section 140 are applied only in a situation where the strike may affect the national economy or endanger national security or be contrary to public order, and that they have been applied in practice only in a few cases. Having also noted the Government's indications in its 2006 report concerning a study to be conducted by the Ministry of Labour on the conformity of the Labour Relations Act B.E. 2518 (1975) with the Convention and the setting up of the Committee on the national policy for legal reform, the Committee reiterates its hope that the necessary measures will soon be taken with a view to bringing the above provisions of the Labour Relations Act into conformity with the Convention, by ensuring that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed for the mere fact of participating in a peaceful strike.

2. Over a number of years, the Committee has been referring to section 117 of the Criminal Code, under which participation in any strike with the purpose of changing the laws of the State, coercing the Government or intimidating the people is punishable with imprisonment (involving compulsory labour). The Committee has noted the Government's repeated statement in its reports that section 117 is essential for national peace and security and does not deprive workers of their labour rights or of the right to strike under the labour law, having no objective to impose any sanctions against workers who participate in strikes pursuing economic and social objectives affecting their occupational interests. The Committee also noted previously the Government's indication that this section had never been applied in practice. While having noted these indications, the Committee refers to the explanations provided in paragraph 188 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour and reiterates its hope that the necessary measures will be taken, on the occasion of the next revision of the Criminal Code, to amend section 117 in such a way that it would be clear from the text itself that strikes pursuing economic and social objectives affecting the workers' occupational interests are removed from the scope of sanctions under this section, in order to bring this provision into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice.

3. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to certain provisions under which workers of state enterprises were prohibited from striking, this prohibition being enforceable with sanctions of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour). The Committee noted, in particular, that the State Enterprise Labour Relations Act B.E. 2543 (2000) prohibits strikes in state enterprises (section 33), violation of this prohibition being punishable with imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) for a term of up to one year; this penalty is doubled in the case of a person who instigates this offence (section 77).

While having noted the Government's statement in its 2006 report concerning the role of state enterprises for the economic and social development of the country and the living standards of the population, the Committee recalls that a blanket prohibition of strikes in all state-owned enterprises, if enforced with penalties involving compulsory labour, is incompatible with the Convention. Having also noted the Government's indications in its report concerning a study to be conducted by the Ministry of Labour on the conformity of the State Enterprise Labour Relations Act B.E. 2543 (2000) with the Convention, the Committee reiterates its firm hope that the necessary measures will soon be taken with a view to amending the above provisions of the State Enterprise Labour Relations Act, so that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed for the mere fact of participating in a peaceful strike, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. It asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on progress made in this regard.

Uganda

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee has noted the Government's report, as well as the discussion which took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2006.

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Abductions of children and forced labour practices in connection with armed conflict. In its earlier comments, the Committee expressed concern about numerous cases of abductions of thousands of children, in connection with armed conflict in the northern part of the country, for the purpose of exploitation of their labour. Abducted children were forced to provide work and services as guards, soldiers and concubines, such abductions being connected with killings, beatings and rape of these children. The Committee observed that continuing existence and scope of the practices of abductions and the exaction of forced labour constitute gross violations of the Convention, since the victims are forced to perform labour for which they have not offered themselves voluntarily, under extremely harsh conditions combined with ill treatment which may include torture and death, as well as sexual exploitation. The Committee therefore urged the Government to take effective and prompt action in order to eliminate these practices and to ensure that, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention, penal sanctions are imposed on persons convicted of having exacted forced labour.

The Committee recalls that the Government has ratified the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182). In so far as Article 3(a) of Convention No. 182 provides that the worst forms of child labour include "all forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery, such as the sale and trafficking of children, debt bondage and serfdom and forced or compulsory labour”, the Committee is of the view that the problem of the forced labour of children may be examined more specifically under Convention No. 182. The protection of children is enhanced by the fact that Convention No. 182 requires States which ratify it to take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to refer to its 2007 comments on the application of Convention No. 182.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1). 1. Legislation concerning compulsory placement of unemployed persons on agricultural enterprises in rural areas. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to section 2(1) of the Community Farm Settlement Decree, 1975, under which any unemployed able-bodied person may be settled on any farm settlement and required to render service; section 15 of the Decree makes it an offence punishable with a fine and imprisonment for any person to fail or refuse to live on any farm settlement or to desert or leave such settlement without authorization. The Committee previously noted the Government’s indication in its report that the abovementioned Decree was in the process of being repealed under the laws of Uganda revision exercise by the Uganda Law Reform Commission. The Committee has also noted from the statement of the Government representative before the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2006, that the 1975 Decree is a “dead law” which is not applied in practice, and that the current Parliament intends to repeal it. While having noted these indications, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Community Farm Settlement Decree, 1975, will be repealed in the near future, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. It asks the Government to supply a copy of the repealing text, as soon as it is adopted.

2. Freedom of career military officers to leave their service. The Committee previously noted the Government’s indication that the Armed Forces (Conditions of Service) (Officers) Regulations, 1969, were replaced by the National Resistance Army (Conditions of Service) (Officers) Regulations, No. 6 of 1993 (now the Uganda Peoples’ Defence Forces (Conditions of Service) (Officers) Regulations). The Committee has noted that section 28(1) of these Regulations contains a provision (which is similar to a corresponding provision of the repealed Regulations) under which the Board may permit officers to resign their commission in writing at any stage during their service. The Committee has noted the Government’s repeated indication in its reports, which was also confirmed by the Government representative in his statement before the Conference Committee in June 2006, that the officer applying for the resignation must give his/her reasons for it, and the Board will consider these reasons and, if it finds them fit, will grant a permission to resign.

The Committee observes that it follows from the wording of section 28(1) that the application to resign may be either accepted or refused. It refers to the explanations provided in paragraphs 46 and 96–97 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, where it pointed out that career military servicemen who have voluntarily entered into an engagement cannot be deprived of the right to leave the service in peacetime within a reasonable period, either at specified intervals, or with previous notice, subject to the conditions which may normally be required to ensure the continuity of the service. The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken with a view to amending section 28(1) of the above Regulations, so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention. Pending such amendment, the Committee again requests the Government to provide information on the application of section 28(1) in practice, indicating in particular the criteria applied by the Board in accepting or rejecting a resignation, as well as the number of resignations accepted and refused.

3. Military service of persons enrolled below the age of 18 years. The Committee previously noted the Government’s indication in its report that the Armed Forces (Conditions of Service) (Men) Regulations, 1969, which provided that the term of service of persons enrolled below the age of 18 years might be extended until they are 30 years old, was repealed by the National Resistance Army (Conditions of Service) (Men) Regulations No. 7 of 1993. The Government indicated that section 5(4) of these Regulations prohibits a person below the age of 18 years or above 30 years to be employed in the armed forces. While having noted these indications, the Committee again requests the Government to supply a copy of Regulations No. 7, 1993, with its next report.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Trade Disputes (Arbitration and Settlement) Act, 1964, which contained provisions under which workers employed in “essential services” may be prohibited from terminating their contract of service, has been repealed by the Labour Disputes (Arbitration and Settlement) Act, 2006 (section 44(1)). Section 34(1) of the new Act expressly provides that an individual employee (employed in “essential services”) shall not be prohibited from giving notice of termination of employment at any time under the Employment Act, 2006.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the following legislation:

- (i) the Public Order and Security Act, No. 20 of 1967, empowering the executive to restrict an individual’s association or communication with others, independently of the commission of any offence and subject to penalties involving compulsory labour;
- (ii) sections 54(2)(c), 55, 56 and 56A of the Penal Code, empowering the minister to declare any combination of two or more people an unlawful society and thus render any speech, publication or activity on behalf of, or in support of, such combination illegal and punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour).

As the Committee repeatedly pointed out, any penal sanctions involving an obligation to perform prison labour are contrary to the Convention when imposed on persons convicted for expressing political views or views opposed to the established political system, or having contravened a widely discretionary administrative decision depriving them of the right to publish their views or suspending or dissolving certain associations (see, for example, paragraphs 152–166 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour).

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken to repeal or amend the abovementioned provisions of the Public Order and Security Act, No. 20 of 1967, and of the Penal Code, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on progress made in this regard.

The Committee is also addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

United States

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1991)

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Sanctions involving compulsory labour for participation in strikes. In observations addressed to the Government since 2002, the Committee has noted that, under article 12, section 95-98.1, of the North Carolina General Statutes, strikes by public employees are declared illegal and against the public policy of the state. Under section 95-99, any violation of the provisions of article 12 is declared to be a class 1 misdemeanour. Under section 15A-1340.23, read together with section 15A-1340.11 of Chapter 15A (Criminal Procedure Act), a person convicted of a class 1 misdemeanour may be sentenced to “community punishment” and, upon a second conviction, to “active punishment”, that is, imprisonment. The Committee has noted the Compendium of Community Corrections Programs in North Carolina, published by the North Carolina Sentencing and Policy Advisory Commission, which explains that the imposition of community punishment may include assignment to the state’s Community Service Work Program (CSWP): “The CSWP is an alternative to incarceration imposed as part of a community punishment or DWI sentence, or in some cases as the sole condition of unsupervised probation.” The report also states: “CSWP is a community punishment. It is also used as a sanctioning tool at every stage of the criminal justice system ... CSWP requires the offender to work for free for public or non-profit agencies in an area that will benefit the greater community.” The Committee has also noted that article 3 (Labor of Prisoners), section 148-26, of Chapter 148 (State Prison System) declares it to be the public policy of the state of North Carolina that all able-bodied prison inmates shall be required to perform diligently all work assignments provided for them.

The Committee notes from its latest report the Government’s repeated assertion that no North Carolina public employee has ever been, or is likely to be, prosecuted under the law in question, and the Committee’s concern remains “hypothetical”, and that “no measures need to be taken to change that state’s law”. The Committee is bound to repeat its observation that the provisions of North Carolina law and policy discussed above contravene Article 1(d) of the Convention. Taking into account the Government’s assertions about the dormancy of the law in question, the Committee trusts it will be all the more cognizant of the need for measures to bring the state’s law into conformity with the Convention, and it urges the Government to do so without further delay.

Uzbekistan

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1997)

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Mobilization and use of labour for purposes of economic development in agriculture (cotton production). The Committee previously noted the observations made by the Council of the Trade Unions Confederation of Uzbekistan, communicated by the Government with its 2004 report, which contained allegations concerning practices of a mobilization and use of labour for purposes of economic development in agriculture (cotton production), in which public sector workers, schoolchildren and university students are involved. It also notes a communication concerning the same subject, dated 17 October 2008, received from the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), which was sent to the Government on 4 November 2008, for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. The IOE alleges that, despite the existence of the legal framework against the use of forced labour, there are continued non-governmental organizations and media reports denouncing the systematic and persistent use of forced labour, including forced child labour, in the cotton fields of Uzbekistan.

The Committee notes the Government’s statements in its latest report, received in March 2008, that under no circumstances may employers use compulsory labour for the production or harvesting of agricultural products in Uzbekistan, and government officials cannot impose compulsory labour on the population for the profit of private employers. The Government also indicates that there are no legislative provisions governing this issue. The Committee notes, however, the adoption in September 2008 of a decree prohibiting the use of child labour in cotton plantations in Uzbekistan.

The Committee requests the Government to comment on the workers’ and employers’ observations referred to above, indicating, in particular, how the participation of the public sector workers, schoolchildren and university students in the cotton harvest is organized, and what measures have been taken or envisaged to ensure the observance of the Convention, which expressly prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour for purposes of economic development. Please also supply available statistics and copies of any relevant documents, reports, studies and enquiries.

The Committee is also addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Zambia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1964)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. The Committee notes the information on measures taken to prevent and combat human trafficking provided by the Government in reply to its earlier comments. It notes, in particular, the Government's indications concerning the adoption of the Penal Code amendments criminalizing human trafficking and the development of the comprehensive piece of legislation which will take into account the provisions of the Palermo Protocol to combat trafficking. The Committee also notes the Government's indications concerning the elaboration of a draft National Anti-Human Trafficking Policy and the establishment of the Inter-Ministerial Task Force and the National Committee to address the problem of trafficking.

The Committee asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the application in practice of the National Plan of Action to combat trafficking, to which reference has been made in the report, as well as the information on practical activities of the Inter-Ministerial Task Force and the National Committee referred to above. Please also supply a copy of the National Anti-Human Trafficking Policy, as well as a copy of the new anti-trafficking legislation, as soon as it is adopted. As regards law enforcement, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the new Penal Code provisions criminalizing human trafficking, to which reference has been made in the report, supplying sample copies of the relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed.

The Committee is also addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 29 (Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Armenia, Belarus, Belize, Bolivia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Botswana, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Comoros, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Croatia, Czech Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Denmark, Dominica, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, France, Gabon, Georgia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Honduras, Islamic Republic of Iran, Ireland, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Kiribati, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Liberia, Malawi, Mauritius, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Namibia, Nepal, New Zealand, Nigeria, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Portugal, Qatar, Russian Federation, Rwanda, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sao Tome and Principe, Serbia, Slovakia, Solomon Islands, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Togo, Tunisia, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom: Anguilla, Uzbekistan, Zambia, Zimbabwe); Convention No. 105 (Afghanistan, Albania, Angola, Armenia, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belarus, Belize, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Botswana, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cambodia, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China: Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, Comoros, Congo, Czech Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Estonia, Ethiopia, Fiji, Gabon, Georgia, Ghana, Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Hungary, Indonesia, Israel, Jordan, Kenya, Kiribati, Kyrgyzstan, Malawi, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Namibia, Oman, Pakistan, Russian Federation, Rwanda, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sao Tome and Principe, Seychelles, Slovakia, South Africa, Sudan, Suriname, United Republic of Tanzania, Thailand, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Togo, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, United States, Uzbekistan, Zimbabwe).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following States in answer to a direct request with regard to Convention No. 29 (Bahamas, China: Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, Cuba, Estonia, Iceland, Luxembourg).

Elimination of child labour and protection of children and young persons

General observation

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138)

Introduction

The Committee has been examining detailed reports on Convention No. 138 and its associated Recommendation No. 146 over a number of years since the Convention came into force in 1976. The Committee also notes that a number of countries have only recently ratified the Convention. There have been a number of direct requests which have been addressed by the Committee to governments, requesting further information on commonly recurring themes. It appears to the Committee that there is lack of understanding by a number of governments as to the operation of the provisions of the Convention and Recommendation on the topic of light work, in particular the provisions regarding the age from which children may engage in light work, the nature of the work and the conditions in which it may be performed including the hours during which it may be undertaken in conformity with the Convention. In the light of this, the Committee makes this general observation in order to clarify the situation for the assistance of member States in the hope that this will result in an improved application of the Convention on employment of children in light work.

Objective of Convention No. 138

The Committee recalls that the principal objective of Convention No. 138 and Recommendation No. 146 is to achieve the effective abolition of child labour, while taking account of the national situations of member States. It also observes that the scope of these instruments is general and covers all economic sectors and all employment and work (General Survey, ILC, 67th Session, 1981, paragraph 56).

Preparatory work concerning light work (Article 7)

The preparatory work shows that differences of views emerged between member States during the drafting of the instruments (ILC, 57th Session, 1972, Report IV(2), pages 39–43 and ILC, 58th Session, 1973, Report IV(2), pages 19–21). While the majority of governments were in favour of a provision on light work, one government advocated greater flexibility of application, and several governments opposed the inclusion of a provision in the Convention permitting exemptions authorizing light work on the grounds that such a provision would restrict the scope of the Convention and would not lead to the complete abolition of child labour. The Committee notes that, despite these differences of views, the Committee on Minimum Age finally adopted a provision on light work. The Committee observes that, according to the preparatory work, Article 7 of the Convention regarding light work, attempts to combine the measure of flexibility necessary to permit the wide application of the Convention (especially in view of its general scope) with the restrictions necessary to ensure adequate protection (ILC, 58th Session, 1973, Report IV(2), page 20). The Committee further notes that, as indicated during the preparatory work, where there are special and substantial problems of application, it would be possible for a government to invoke Article 4 of the Convention, when it sends its first report, allowing it to exclude from the application of the Convention limited categories of employment or work in respect of which special and substantial problems of application arise, after due consultation and subject to the prescribed safeguards (ILC, 58th Session, 1973, Report IV(2), page 21).

Provisions of Convention No. 138 and Recommendation No. 146 governing light work

The Committee recalls that, under the terms of Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention, national laws or regulations may permit the employment or work of persons 13–15 years of age (or 12–14 years of age) on work which is: (a) not likely to be harmful to their health or development; and (b) not such as to prejudice their attendance at school, their participation in vocational orientation or training programmes approved by the competent authority or their capacity to benefit from the instruction received. It further recalls that, under the terms of Article 7, paragraph 3, of the Convention, the competent authority shall determine the activities in which employment or work may be permitted and shall prescribe the number of hours during which and the conditions in which such employment or work may be undertaken. In this respect, the Committee draws the attention of governments to Paragraph 13(1) of Recommendation No. 146, under the terms of which, to give effect to Article 7, paragraph 3, of the Convention, special attention should be given to:

- (a) the provision of fair remuneration and its protection, bearing in mind the principle of equal pay for work of equal value;
- (b) the strict limitation of the hours spent at work in a day and in a week, and the prohibition of overtime, so as to allow enough time for education and training (including the time needed for homework related thereto), for rest during the day and for leisure activities;
- (c) the granting, without possibility of exception save in genuine emergency, of a minimum consecutive period of 12 hours' night rest, and of customary weekly rest days;

- (d) the granting of an annual holiday with pay of at least four weeks and, in any case, not shorter than that granted to adults;
- (e) coverage by social security schemes, including employment injury, medical care and sickness benefit schemes, whatever the conditions of employment or work may be;
- (f) the maintenance of satisfactory standards of safety and health and appropriate instruction and supervision.

Age of admission to light work determined by national legislation

Over the past few years, the Committee has examined a very large number of detailed reports provided by States which have ratified the Convention recently, with the great majority of the comments being addressed to the governments concerned in the form of direct requests. In these comments, the Committee has been able to note the adoption of national legislation giving effect to Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention. The reports examined show that a large number of countries have determined the age of admission to light work and have laid down, in conformity with the provisions of the Convention, that these types of work shall not be likely to be harmful to the health or development of children, nor such as to prejudice their attendance at school, their participation in vocational orientation or training programmes approved by the competent authority or their capacity to benefit from the instruction received. The Committee has noted, in particular, that in countries that have specified a minimum age for admission to employment or work of 15 or 16 years, the age from which employment on light work may be authorized has been set at 13 years, while in those countries which have determined a minimum age for admission to employment of 14 years, the age for admission to light work is 12 years. These specifications are in compliance with the Convention. The Committee has also noted that while certain countries have not determined an age of admission to light work, it has observed that, in the great majority of these cases, this is because they have not regulated employment in these types of work. However, a certain number of countries have indicated that they will adopt measures in this respect.

Determination in national legislation of the types of light work and the conditions under which they are undertaken

With regard to Article 7, paragraph 3, of the Convention, examination of the reports received has enabled the Committee to observe that, while a small number of countries have determined the types of light work and established the hours of work during which and the conditions in which such employment may be undertaken, a fairly large number have still not adopted measures giving effect to the Convention on this point. The Committee, however, has noted that a number of countries have indicated that they would adopt legislative measures to apply this provision of the Convention. The Committee has also observed that the types of light work most frequently determined are as follows: (1) agricultural work, such as the preparation of seeds and crops, the maintenance of crops without the use of insecticides or herbicides, the harvesting of fruit, vegetables or flowers, picking and sorting in farms and herding; (2) forestry work and landscaping, including the planting of bushes and the maintenance of public gardens, without the use of insecticides or herbicides; (3) domestic work, such as kitchen help, household help or looking after children; and (4) the distribution of mail, newspapers, periodicals or publicity. The Committee has further noted that some countries have laid down the hours of work for light work, namely between two and four-and-a-half hours a day and between ten and 25 hours a week. Certain countries have also established that the time spent in school and on light work shall not exceed seven hours in the day, while others prohibit employment on light work during school term time. Furthermore, certain countries prohibit night work (between 8 p.m. and 6 a.m.) and work on Sundays and public holidays, while others provide for annual leave of up to four weeks a year.

In view of the above, the Committee requests all governments to indicate in future reports under the Convention the measures adopted or envisaged to give effect to Article 7 of the Convention and to specify the measures regulating employment in light work, including those determining types of light work and establishing hours of work and conditions of employment and work. Furthermore, as a number of governments have indicated that they will adopt measures to determine an age from which employment on light work may be authorized, the Committee requests those governments to indicate the measures adopted or envisaged in this respect.

Finally, in the case of those countries that have not regulated light work, the Committee requests the governments concerned to indicate whether, in practice, children undertake light work activities and, if so, the types of light work that they undertake. It also requests these governments to indicate the manner in which the protection afforded by Convention No. 138 and Recommendation No. 146 is ensured for children who undertake such activities in practice.

Albania

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee takes note of the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee had observed the information provided by the Confederation of Trade Unions of Albania that there were children who fell victim to trafficking, sexual abuse and organized crime. It had also noted that, according to the Rapid Assessment of Trafficking in Children for Labour and Sexual Exploitation in Albania, carried out under the supervision of the ILO–IPEC in 2003 (page 7), since the turn of the century, the reported number of children being trafficked across borders for labour and sexual exploitation had steadily increased in Albania. Moreover, according to the Government’s initial report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC/C/11/Add.27 of 5 July 2004, paragraphs 269–272), about 4,000 children had migrated unaccompanied by their parents (3,000 to Greece and 1,000 to Italy). These children were often exposed to numerous risks, including maltreatment, physical and sexual abuse and other illicit activities. The Committee had noted that section 128/b of the Penal Code, as amended by Law No. 9188 of 2004, prohibits the trafficking of minors for sexual exploitation, forced labour and slavery or any other form of exploitation. It had, therefore, observed that, although the trafficking of children for labour or sexual exploitation was prohibited by law, it remained an issue of concern in practice.

The Committee notes that, according to the Report of the UN Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography of 27 March 2006 (E/CN.4/2006/67/Add.2), although Albania has emerged since 2001 as a source country for persons trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labour, in recent years, due to the intervention of the Albanian and Greek authorities and the increased awareness of the population, trends indicate a decline in children who fall victim to trafficking for labour exploitation (paragraphs 10 and 15). It notes, with interest, that the Government adopted the National Strategy and Plan of Action for the Fight Against Child Trafficking and the Protection of Child Victims of Trafficking for the period 2005–07 (National Strategy and Plan of Action against Child Trafficking), which is part of the Albanian National Strategy and Action Plan for Combating Trafficking in Human Beings 2005–07. The National Strategy and Plan of Action against Child Trafficking, provided by the Government, focuses on:

- (a) preventing child trafficking;
- (b) enforcing the legal provisions prohibiting child trafficking;
- (c) providing child victims of trafficking with rehabilitative services and repatriating them to their countries of origin; and
- (d) coordinating anti-child trafficking actors at the national, international, governmental and non-governmental central and local levels.

In particular, measures to prevent child trafficking include:

- (a) law enforcement and border control aspects;
- (b) awareness raising on the risks of child trafficking and the importance of compulsory education;
- (c) setting up procedures to reintegrate into school or insert, in vocational training programmes, children who drop out of school and are at risk of being trafficked; and
- (d) training on the prevention of child trafficking for the police, prosecutors, educational and welfare personnel, at national and local levels.

With regard to the measures to enforce the legal provisions prohibiting child trafficking, these mainly concern the improvement of mechanisms of detection, prosecution and punishment of child traffickers. They include:

- (a) the exchange of information on suspected cases of child trafficking between law enforcement agencies and social services;
- (b) training of police officers, prosecutors and judges to deal with child trafficking prosecutions; and
- (c) implementing a witness protection approach towards child victims of trafficking.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the National Strategy and Plan of Action against Child Trafficking on eliminating the internal and cross-border trafficking of children under 18 years for labour and sexual exploitation. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied for trafficking children under 18 years of age for labour or commercial sexual exploitation, as a result of the National Strategy and Plan of Action against Child Trafficking.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. Inter-Ministerial Committee for the Fight against Trafficking in Human Beings and Anti-Trafficking Office. The Committee had previously observed that an Inter-Ministerial Committee for the Fight against Trafficking in Human Beings began functioning in January 2002. It notes that this Inter-Ministerial Committee, together with the Child Trafficking Working Group and various ministries, was responsible for the monitoring and implementation of the National Strategy and Plan of Action against Child Trafficking.

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. National Strategy for Children. The Committee had previously observed that the National Strategy for Children (2001–05) defined the strategic objectives of the government policy and aimed at awareness raising with regard to the phenomenon of trafficking in children. It notes that, according to the Government report, the National Strategy for Children was extended for another five years (2005–10). It aims, amongst others, at combating child trafficking. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the National Strategy for Children 2005–10 on eliminating the trafficking of children under 18 years of age for labour or commercial sexual exploitation.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest that the National Strategy and Plan of Action against Child Trafficking contains various measures to protect and rehabilitate child victims of trafficking and reintegrate them in their communities. These measures include:

- (a) improving the capacity of the National Reception Centre for Victims of Trafficking to receive and accommodate child victims of trafficking;
- (b) improving the professional level of social welfare staff responsible for the reception of child trafficking victims;
- (c) providing rehabilitative services, including education, vocational training, and health services to child victims of trafficking;
- (d) preparing child victims of trafficking to return to their families, if appropriate; and
- (e) regulating and funding the “Assisted Voluntary Return” procedures for child victims of trafficking in coordination with neighbouring countries and other European destination or transit countries for child trafficking (especially Greece and Italy).

The Committee also notes that, in the framework of the Albanian National Strategy and National Action Plan for Combating Trafficking in Human Beings a “Cooperation Agreement to Establish a National Referral Mechanism for the Enhanced Identification of and Assistance to Victims of Trafficking” was signed between various ministries, the National Reception Centre for Victims of Human Trafficking, various NGOs and the IOM in Tirana. This agreement provides for various measures to identify, protect and rehabilitate child victims of trafficking and reintegrate them in their communities. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of children under 18 years of age who have been withdrawn from trafficking for labour and commercial sexual exploitation and reintegrated in their communities, following the implementation of the National Strategy and Plan of Action Against Child Trafficking 2005–07, as well as the Cooperation Agreement to Establish a National Referral Mechanism for the Enhanced Identification of and Assistance to Victims of Trafficking.

Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. Street children and child beggars. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the ITUC’s allegations that research conducted in 2007 on child begging in the towns of Tirana, Elbasan and Korca in Albania and in Thessaloniki in Greece, where Albanian children are also known to beg, showed that significant numbers of Albanian boys and girls are affected by begging. The research suggests that begging, whether forced or not, starts at a young age, as early as 4 or 5 years. The ITUC also indicates that the research identified a number of interrelated causes of child begging in Albania, including poverty and discrimination. All of the child beggars interviewed during the research came from the Roma or Egyptian communities. The ITUC therefore recommends that practical steps be undertaken to address the root causes of begging, particularly discrimination on the grounds of ethnicity and poverty. The ITUC also urges the Government to provide an effective child protection safety net; assist children who work on the streets to overcome barriers to education and help them re-enter the school system; introduce and support programmes to reduce the poverty and inequality faced by Roma and Egyptian communities; and consider reducing the “demand” for child begging through discouraging people from giving to children who beg.

The Committee further notes that, according to the report of the UN Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography of 27 March 2006 (E/CN.4/2006/67/Add.2, paragraph 56, page 15), the most visible form of child labour in Albania is street work. Children working on the streets are mainly boys employed in small trade and services, transport and street construction. Girls are used for begging and washing cars. It notes that one of the target groups of the Strategic Framework for Action on Child Labour in Albania, developed in the framework of the ILO–IPEC Programme “Development of a national programme on elimination of child labour in Albania”, is children who work on the streets.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that exploitation of children in the streets of Albania has been favoured by the lack of a national mechanism for the protection of children, the poor enforcement of the right to education for all children and the insignificant punishment of child exploiters. In this regard, both the Government and the ITUC indicate that, in January 2008, the Criminal Code was amended to include the exploitation of children for begging as a separate criminal offence. Furthermore, in May 2008, the Ministry of Labour, Social Affairs and Equal Chances drafted a framework law for the protection of children’s rights which aims at regulating the national mechanism for child protection. The Government also indicates that, on 30 July 2008, Decision No. 1104 of the Council of Ministers endorsed the policy document on the “Custody of children in need”, which comprises an important platform for the application of new alternative services for children in need, including children forced into labour, by placing these children in foster families when the parents cannot exert their parental responsibilities. In this context, the Committee requests the Government to indicate how far the policy of criminalizing the exploitation of children for begging and the policy of finding foster families for children lead to the separation of Roma and Egyptian children from their families and prevents the reintegration of those children with their families.

The Committee further notes that Children’s Rights Protection Units, established in nine municipalities, identify children who need protection, including street children and manage those situations with the assistance of a multidisciplinary team by conducting evaluations of the children identified and their families and coordinating the protection of these cases. The Government also indicates that work has been done to strengthen the Community Advisory Groups in the Roma and Egyptian communities in order to prevent child exploitation and serve as referral systems for the protection of children. Finally, the Committee notes the Government's information that, since September 2007, all unregistered Roma children can attend schools across the country and that, in the meantime, a special strategy for Roma children has been drafted and is being implemented.

The Committee expresses its deep concern at the grave situation of children begging on the streets in Albania. It considers that children living or working on the streets are particularly exposed to the worst forms of child labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of children found working in the streets and then rehabilitated and integrated as a result of the "Custody of children in need" programme, the Children's Rights Protection Units and the Community Advisory Groups. It also requests the Government to supply a copy of the special strategy for Roma children and to provide information on the impact of this strategy for Roma children from working in the streets. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the infringements reported with regard to the new penal provision on the prohibition of the exploitation of children for begging as well as on the number of prosecutions, convictions and penalties applied.

Article 8. International cooperation. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes that the National Strategy and Plan of Action against Child Trafficking provides for measures to cooperate at the international and regional levels in order to prevent child trafficking. These measures involve:

- (a) reviewing relevant bilateral law enforcement agreements between Albania and countries of the region for combating child trafficking;
- (b) negotiating new cooperation agreements with neighbouring countries with a view to detecting trafficked children and sharing data on child trafficking;
- (c) intensifying cross-border cooperation against trafficking with the border police of neighbouring countries; and
- (d) cooperating with the national child protection structures, international organizations and NGOs in countries of destination of trafficked children.

The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the impact of these measures on combating the cross-border trafficking of children for labour and sexual exploitation.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes that the National Strategy and Plan of Action against Child Trafficking 2005–07 provides for the creation of a comprehensive and coordinated system for collecting, analysing and disseminating data on child trafficking. In view of the recent creation of a comprehensive and coordinated system for collecting, analysing and disseminating data on child trafficking, the Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of available data on the trafficking of children under 18 years of age for labour and sexual exploitation.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Algeria

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1984)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in the context of the project on the national strategy for children, the administration responsible for the family had organized a strategic planning workshop for the protection of children in February 2007 in collaboration with UNICEF. Following the workshop, recommendations for the protection of children were formulated for the period between 2007 and 2015. The Committee also noted that the Government had initiated a Bill on the protection of children. It requested the Government to provide information on the implementation of the recommendations and on the results achieved, and asked the Government to provide a copy of the Act on the protection of children once it had been adopted. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the evaluation by the Follow-up and Evaluation Committee of the National Plan of Action for the Protection and Development of Children will be provided later. The Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to provide with its next report the evaluation by the Follow-up Committee of the effect given to the recommendations made following the strategic planning workshop for the protection of children held in February 2007, and on the results achieved in terms of the progressive abolition of child labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the Act on the protection of children once it has been adopted.

Article 2, paragraph 1. Scope of Application. The Committee noted previously that Act No. 90-11 respecting conditions of work of 21 April 1990 does not apply to employment relations which are not governed by a contract, such as work done by children on their own account. According to the Government, the Act does not apply to persons working on their own account, who are covered by other regulations which determine the minimum age for admission to non-wage work. In this respect, the Government indicates that section 5 of Ordinance No. 75-59 of 26 September 1975 issuing the Code of Commerce (Code of Commerce) provides that any emancipated minor of either sex, aged 18 or above, who wishes to engage in commercial activity, may not commence commercial operations or be considered of majority age with regard to any commitments she/he enters into for commercial purposes unless the said minor has received prior authorization from her/his father or mother or, in the absence of a father and mother, through a decision of the family council approved by a court of law. The Government added that, under this provision, regulations respecting admission to employment are of a general nature and apply to all forms of employment, whether waged or own account. The Committee noted that this provision of the Code of Commerce concerns emancipated minors of either sex, aged 18 or above, who wish to engage in a commercial activity. The situation to which the Committee referred concerns children under 18 years of age covered by the Convention who are engaged in an economic activity outside an employment relationship in the informal economy or on their own account. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the protection afforded by the Convention is applied to children who are engaged in economic activity on their own account.

In its report, the Government indicates that, with regard to the age for admission to non-wage work, Algerian law prohibits access to employment for young persons under 18 years of age. In this respect, it refers once again to section 5 of the Code of Commerce, which provides that any emancipated minor of either sex, aged 18 or over, who wishes to engage in commercial activity, may not commence commercial operations or be considered of majority age with regard to the commitments entered into for commercial purposes unless the said person has received prior authorization from her/his father or mother or, in the absence of a father and mother, through a decision of the family council approved by a court of law. The Committee notes that commercial activities are defined in sections 2 and 3 of the Code of Commerce. Under the terms of section 2 of the Code, commercial activities include any purchase of movables for resale, either in their present state or after having worked or processed them. The Committee notes that these provisions of the Code of Commerce regulate the possibility for emancipated minors of either sex, aged 18 or above, to engage in a commercial activity in the formal economy. The Committee accordingly understands that work performed by a minor who is not emancipated on her or his own account or in the informal economy, for example as a small trader, is prohibited by the Code of Commerce. However, it notes that these provisions of the Code of Commerce do not regulate all the economic activities that a child under 16 years of age may carry on in the informal economy or on her or his own account and which are covered by the Convention, for example in the agricultural and domestic sectors. In this respect, the Committee notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations to the Government's second periodic report of October 2005 (CRC/C/15/Add.269, paragraph 74), noted with concern that the minimum age for admission to employment (16 years) does not apply to children working in the informal economy (for example, agriculture and domestic service). The Committee on the Rights of the Child recommended the Government to take effective measures to prohibit the economic exploitation of children, particularly in the informal economy, where their exploitation is more prevalent.

The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of section 5 of the Code of Commerce, with an indication of the manner in which the application of this provision is supervised. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which children who are not bound by a subordinate employment relationship, such as those working on their own account or in the informal economy, benefit from the protection envisaged by the Convention. In this respect, it would be grateful if the Government would envisage the possibility of adopting measures to adapt and strengthen the labour inspection services so as to ensure such protection.

Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2. Minimum age for admission to hazardous work and determination of these types of work. The Committee previously noted the information provided by the Government that a revision of the national labour legislation is in progress and that the issue of prohibiting the engagement of persons under 18 years of age in hazardous type of work will be taken into account. It also noted the Government's indication that a list of prohibited types of work would be established by regulation. The Committee notes the Government's indication that specific provisions such as to clarify any ambiguity on these matters are envisaged in the future Labour Code. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the revision of the Labour Code will be completed in the near future and that provisions giving full effect to Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Convention, namely that the minimum age for admission to any type of hazardous employment or work shall not be under 18 years of age and that a list of these types of employment or work shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, will be adopted in the very near future. It requests the Government to provide information on any development in this respect.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government that the labour inspection services drew up 184 notifications covering a total of 210 offences in 2006 and 2007. Of these, 77 were investigated by the competent jurisdictions and gave rise to penalties. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the penalties imposed by the competent jurisdictions following these prosecutions. It also requests the Government to continue providing information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice including, for example, statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, extracts from the reports of the inspection services and details on the number and nature of the contraventions reported, and on the penalties imposed.

Antigua and Barbuda

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1983)

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government's attention to the fact that the provisions of the national legislation respecting the minimum age for admission to employment or work were not in conformity with the age specified by the Government when ratifying the Convention. Indeed, although the Government had specified the minimum age of 16 years when ratifying the Convention, section E3 of the Labour Code of 1975 provides that no child shall be employed or shall work in a public or private agricultural or industrial undertaking or in any branch thereof, or on any ship, while the term "child", by virtue of section E2 of the Labour Code, means a person under the age of 14 years. The Committee has noted on several occasions that amendments to the Labour Code were under examination with a view to bringing the minimum age for admission to employment or work into conformity with the minimum age specified when ratifying the Convention and with the compulsory school-leaving age which, under section 43(1) of the Education Act of 1973, is 16 years of age. The Committee notes that in its most recent report, the Government indicates that the Labour Code is presently under review and that the comments of the Committee would be taken into account. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section E2 of the Labour Code, so as to define a child as a person under the age of 16 years, which would bring the minimum age for admission to employment or work in the national legislation into conformity with the minimum age specified by the Government when ratifying the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on progress made in amending the Labour Code.

Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2. Minimum age for admission to hazardous work and determination of these types of work. The Committee reminds the Government that Article 3, paragraph 1, of the Convention provides that the minimum age for admission to any type of employment or work, which by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out is likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of young persons, shall not be less than 18 years. It also reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Convention, the types of hazardous employment or work shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. The Committee noted the Government's indication that the Labour Code is presently under review and that the comments of the Committee would be taken into account. The Committee requests the Government to provide information regarding progress towards the adoption of the amendments to the Labour Code, which would contain a list of activities and occupations to be prohibited to persons below 18 years of age, in accordance with Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Convention. It also requests the Government to provide information on the consultations held with organizations of employers and workers concerned on this subject. Finally, the Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the amendments to the Labour Code once they have been adopted.

Article 4, paragraph 2. Exclusion of limited categories of employment or work. The Committee had previously noted that section E3 of the Labour Code provides that the prohibition upon the employment or work of children, that is persons under the age of 14 years (section E2), does not apply to any undertaking or ship on which only members of the same family are employed, to members of a recognized youth organization who are engaged collectively in such employment for the purposes of fund-raising for such an organization, nor to a child who is working together with adult members of his/her family on the same work and at the same time and place. It once again requests the Government to indicate in future reports any changes in law and practice in respect of these excluded categories.

Argentina

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1996)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted a study entitled "Childhood and adolescence: Work and other economic activities", carried out by ILO-IPEC, the National Statistics and Census Institute of Argentina and the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security, published in 2006. According to this study, out of a total of 193,095 children aged between 5 and 13 years who were engaged in work when the study was undertaken in 2004, 116,990 worked for their parents or other family members, 61,074 worked on their own account, 11,694 worked for an employer and 3,337 were engaged in another activity. The study also demonstrated that the scale of child labour is greater in rural than in urban areas and that girls, particularly adolescent girls, are engaged in "intense domestic work". The sectors most concerned were commerce, agriculture, stock rearing, hotels, catering, construction, furniture manufacturing and domestic work. The Committee noted that a new National Plan for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour had been formulated.

The Committee notes with interest the detailed information provided by the Government on the measures taken to implement the National Plan for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour. It particularly took note of the following information:

- the signing of an agreement between the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security and the Ministry of Education, Science and Technology with a view to implementing the National Programme for Educational Integration, which provides for measures to enable boys and girls at work to leave their work and rejoin or remain within the school system, including remedial courses and economic assistance;

- the establishment of the network of enterprises against child labour on 27 June 2007;
- the increased participation of workers' organizations in efforts to combat child labour, which led to the signing of a Memorandum of Intent for the prevention and elimination of child labour in the agricultural sector on 12 June 2007;
- training workshops for labour inspectors and tobacco producers in Salta and Jujuy; and
- campaigns to make the population, teachers and health officials aware of child labour, especially in tobacco plantations.

The Committee also notes the Government's statement that monitoring centres for child labour will be set up in the country. The aim of these centres is to gather and analyse information on child labour, and promote cooperation between the players at government level and NGOs. The Committee also takes due note of the Government's statement that a survey on the work of boys, girls and young persons aged between 5 and 17 years of age in the provinces of Córdoba and Misiones was carried out at the end of 2006. The findings of this survey are currently being verified.

The Committee appreciates the measures made by the Government to abolish child labour, which demonstrate its political will to develop strategies to combat this problem. It requests the Government to continue its efforts to eliminate child labour. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures that will be adopted in the context of the National Plan for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour and on the results achieved. The Committee also invites the Government to send information on the application of the Convention in practice by giving, for example, statistical data on the employment of children and young people and extracts from reports of the inspection services. Finally, it requests the Government to provide a copy of the findings of the survey on the work of boys, girls and young persons aged between 5 and 17 years of age in the provinces of Córdoba and Misiones, once they have been verified.

Article 2, paragraph 1. Scope of application. The Committee previously pointed out that the national legislation governing the admission of children to employment or work did not apply to non-contractual employment relations, such as work carried out by children on their own account. In this regard, the Government indicated that the activities undertaken by young persons outside the context of the law were not exercised on their own account, but as a survival strategy. The Committee noted that, according to the study entitled "Childhood and adolescence: Work and other economic activities", it was increasingly frequent for children under 14 years of age to be engaged in activities on their own account or for survival in the country. It stressed that children who carried out an economic activity without a contractual employment relationship, particularly on their own account or as part of a survival strategy, must benefit the protection afforded by the Convention.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 2(3), of Act No. 26.390 of 25 June 2008 on the prohibition of child labour and protection of young workers (Act on the prohibition of child labour and protection of young workers), provides that work involving children under 16 years of age is prohibited in all its forms, irrespective of whether or not there is a contractual employment relationship or whether or not the work is remunerated. It also notes that, under section 2(5), the labour inspection services must exercise their role to enforce this prohibition.

Article 2, paragraphs 2 and 5. Raising the minimum age for admission to employment or work. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest that the Act on the prohibition of child labour and protection of young workers raises the minimum age of admission to employment or to work initially specified. Under sections 7 and 23 of this Act, the minimum age of admission to employment provided under section 189 of Act No. 20.744 on labour contracts (Act on labour contracts) is raised from 14 to 15 years, until 25 May 2010, and, after that date, the age will be raised from 15 to 16 years. The Committee also notes that the Act on the prohibition of child labour and protection of young workers also raises the minimum age of employment from 14 to 15 years, in an initial stage, and then from 15 to 16 years, in the following legislation: Legislative Decree No. 326/56 of 20 January 1956 on domestic service; Act No. 22.248 of 10 July 1989 on the national scheme of agricultural work (Act on the national scheme of agricultural work); Act No. 23.551 of 22 April 1988 on trade union associations; and Act No. 25.013 of 2 September 1998 on labour reform, including apprenticeship contracts. The Committee takes the opportunity to draw the Government's attention to the provisions of paragraph 2 of Article 2 of the Convention, which provides that any Member having ratified this Convention may subsequently notify the Director-General of the International Labour Office, by a new declaration, that it has raised the minimum age that it had previously specified. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would consider the possibility of sending a declaration of this nature to the Office.

Article 7. Light work. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that neither section 189 of the Act on labour contracts nor section 107 of the Act on the national scheme of agricultural work established an age for admission to employment in the case of light work. The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 189bis(1) of the Act on labour contracts, as added by the Act on the prohibition of child labour and protection of young workers, established that young persons aged more than 14 years and less than 16 years may be employed in enterprises belonging to their father, mother or tutor, for a period not exceeding three hours per day and 15 hours per week, provided that these activities are not dangerous or harmful and prevent them from going to school. The family enterprises in which the minor is working must request authorization from the administrative labour authority in the district concerned. Under section 189bis(2), this authorization cannot be requested if the family enterprise is economically dependent upon another enterprise. Furthermore, the Committee notes that section 107 of the Act on the national scheme of agricultural work, as amended by the Act on the prohibition of child labour and protection of young workers, provides the same regulation as that contained in section 189bis of the Act on labour contracts.

Austria

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the comments made by the Federal Chamber of Labour (BAK).

Article 7. Light work. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that, by virtue of section 5a(1) of the Employment of Children and Young People Act, 1987 (ECYPA), and section 110(3) of the Provincial Labour Act of 1984, children aged "12 years" may be employed, under certain conditions, in occasional light work in enterprises in which only members of the owner's family are employed, or in a private household. The Committee noted the Government's indication that an amendment in this regard was not specifically planned at the time, but will be put on the agenda of future negotiations between the social partners in agriculture and forestry. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on any developments made with regard to the raising of the minimum age for light work from 12 to 13 years. The Committee notes in the Government's report that there have been no negotiations for a long time on raising from 12 to 13 years the minimum age for carrying out light work. Nevertheless, this important subject remains on the table for negotiations. The Committee also notes that the BAK has not received any information on the possible raising of the minimum age for admission to light work in the ECYPA and the Agricultural Labour Act 1984. The Committee, reminding the Government that Article 7 of the Convention states that national laws or regulations may permit the employment or work of persons 13–15 years of age in light work, expresses the firm hope that the Government will do what is necessary, as soon as possible, to finally harmonize its national legislation with the Convention by raising the minimum age for light work from 12 to 13 years of age. It requests the Government to continue providing information on any developments made with regard to the raising of the minimum age for light work from 12 to 13 years.

Part V of the report form. Practical application of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's breakdown of the violations concerning the employment of children and young persons, both by economic sector and by federal province in 2006–07. In 2006, a total of four and 982 violations concerning children and young persons, respectively, were detected; in 2007, these numbers were five and 951, respectively. In both years, the vast majority of the violations detected were in the sectors of: hotels and restaurants; the repair of motor vehicles and consumer goods; and construction. In addition, the BAK states that other sectors where violations were detected are: flower arrangers and florists; bakers; and hairdressers. In 2006, 434 of all violations concerned rest breaks, rest time, night rest periods, rest on Sundays and public holidays and weekly working hours; in 2007, the number of these violations was 414. The other violations detected concerned: the keeping of registers of children and young persons; prohibited and restricted work; and maximum working hours. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the manner in which the Convention is applied, including, for example, statistical data on the employment of children and young persons and information on the number and nature of violations detected involving children and young persons.

Azerbaijan

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report contains no reply to previous comments. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. 1. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee had recalled that the minimum age of 16 years was specified under Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention as regards Azerbaijan. It had noted with regret that the new Labour Code, in section 42(3), allows a person who has reached the age of 15 to be part of an employment contract; section 249(1) of the same Code specifies that "persons who are under the age of 15 shall not be employed under any circumstances". Moreover, the Individual Contracts of Employment Agreement Act, section 12(2), sets the minimum age for concluding an employment contract at 14 years. The Committee once again points out that the Convention allows and encourages the raising of the minimum age but does not permit lowering of the minimum age once specified. Therefore, the Committee once again asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged, pursuant to its declaration under Article 2 of the Convention, to ensure that access to employment of children of 14 and 15 years of age may be allowed exceptionally, only for work that meets the criteria set out in Article 7 of the Convention.

2. Scope of application. The Committee had previously taken note of section 7(2) of the new Labour Code, which rules that "labour relations shall be established upon the execution of a written employment contract", and section 4(1) declaring that "this Code applies to all enterprises, establishments, organizations as well as workplaces where an employment agreement exists". Recalling that Convention No. 138 requires the fixing of a minimum age for all types of work or employment and not only for work under an employment contract, the Committee again asks the Government to supply information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the application of the Convention to all types of work outside an employment relationship, such as self-employment.

Article 3, paragraph 2. Determination of types of hazardous work. The Committee noted the Government's indication that a list of arduous and hazardous industries or occupations where the employment of persons under 18 years of age is prohibited was approved by Decision No. 58 of the Cabinet of Ministers of the Republic of Azerbaijan on 24 March 2000. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the text.

Article 7. Light work. The Committee had previously noted that section 249(2) of the new Labour Code allows youths who have reached the age of 14 to work after school hours in light duty work, which poses no hazard to their health, and upon the written consent of their parents. It noted the Government's indication that according to section 91(2) employees up to 16 years of age shall not work more than 24 hours per week, that they shall be granted no less than 42 calendar days of vacation per year (section 119(1)) and that vacation shall be granted at the time of convenience for them (section 133(3)). It also noted that employees under 18 years shall undertake a medical examination before being admitted to work (section 252 of the Labour Code). Moreover, the Committee noted that under section 254 of the Labour Code, a person younger than 18 years of age shall not work at night (i.e. 8 p.m. to 7 a.m. according to section 254(2)), perform overtime, work on weekends, days off or public holidays or be sent on assignments. However, the Committee reminded the Government that under Article 7, paragraph 3, the competent authority shall determine the activities in which employment or work may be permitted as light work. The Committee once again requests the Government to supply further information on the types of light work that are permitted for persons who have attained 14 years of age.

Article 9, paragraph 1. Penalties. The Committee had previously noted the Government's statement in its 2000 report that sections 136–138, 167 and 168 of the Penal Code regulate sanctions for violations of the labour law. The Committee however notes that sections 136–138 of the Penal Code deal with illegal artificial fertilization, sale–purchase of body organs and the illegal implementation of biomedical research on a person; and sections 167 and 168 deal with religious activities. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate which of the provisions in its national legislation regulate sanctions for violations of the labour law and to supply a copy of the same.

Part V of the report form. Practical application of the Convention. The Committee once again asks the Government to supply data to give a general appreciation of the manner in which the Convention is applied, for instance, statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, extracts from the report inspection services, and information on the number and nature of contraventions reported.

The Committee is also addressing a request directly to the Government on another point.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Bangladesh

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that sections 5(1) and 6(1) of the Suppression of Violence against Women and Children Act (SVWCA) prohibit the sale and trafficking of women (irrespective of their age) and children for purposes of prostitution or immoral acts. It had noted that, by virtue of section 2(k) of the SVWCA, as amended in 2003, a “child” means a person under 16 years of age. It had observed, consequently, that the SVWCA does not prohibit the sale and trafficking of boys between 16 and 18 years of age. It had reminded the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(a) of the Convention, the sale and trafficking of both boys and girls under 18 is prohibited. The Committee notes the Government's information that it will take the necessary steps to amend the SVWCA in order to ensure that the sale and trafficking of all children under 18 years of age is prohibited. In this regard, the Committee once again reminds the Government that, under Article 1 of the Convention, immediate and effective measures to prohibit this worst form of child labour must be taken as a matter of urgency. Accordingly, the Committee urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that the amendments to the SVWCA, according to which the sale and trafficking of all children under 18 will be prohibited, are adopted in the very near future. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. The Committee had previously noted that the anti-trafficking unit, established within the Ministry of Home Affairs, and the Criminal Investigation Department (CID) deal with child trafficking issues. It had noted the Government's information that the police and other law enforcement agencies, as well as local governmental organizations, are involved in the fight against trafficking. It had further noted that although a lack of resources hinders investigations, Bangladesh has expanded anti-trafficking police units to every district to encourage victims to testify against traffickers and to compile data on trafficking. The Committee had noted that, in response to inadequately trained police and prosecutors, the Government has worked with legal experts to provide specialized training to prosecutors and, with the International Organization for Migration, to develop a trafficking course for the national police academy and for immigration officials. The Committee notes that, according to a trafficking in persons report of 2008 (trafficking report of 2008), available on the website of the High-Commissioner for Refugees (www.unhcr.org), airport authorities screen travellers to identify and stop potential victims and traffickers before they leave the country. The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of 5 July 2007, in consideration of the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography, the Committee on the Rights of the Child encouraged the Government to continue its efforts to strengthen its judicial and police cooperation activities at the international level for the prevention, detection, investigation, prosecution and punishment of those responsible for acts involving the sale of children (CRC/C/OPSC/BDG/CO/1, paragraph 44). The Committee accordingly requests the Government to continue its efforts in strengthening the role of the CID, the police and the Anti-Child Trafficking Unit, in order to enable them to combat the trafficking of children for labour and sexual exploitation. It requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the International Trade Union Confederation's (ITUC) indication that women and children are trafficked from Bangladesh to India, Pakistan and countries in the Middle East where they are forced to work as prostitutes, factory workers or camel jockeys. The Committee had noted that the two-year Subregional Programme to Combat Trafficking in Children for Sexual and Exploitative Employment (TICSA) in Bangladesh, Nepal and Sri Lanka was renewed in 2002 and expanded to Pakistan, Thailand and Indonesia (TICSA-II). It had noted the Government's statement that it has enacted different laws and adopted various developmental projects in collaboration with international agencies in order to prevent trafficking, especially through advocacy programmes, workshops and public awareness campaigns. It had finally noted the Government's statement that the rate of trafficking in children and women has reduced considerably because of the measures adopted and the enforcement of the provisions of laws.

The Committee notes that the TICSA-II project in Bangladesh has ended. It notes with interest that, according to the technical progress report for TICSA-II of 20 April 2006 (TPR for TICSA-II), in the framework of the project, 156 camel jockeys returned to Bangladesh from the UAE and are in the process of rehabilitation at the Bangladesh National Lawyers' Association shelter home and at the Dhaka Ahsania Mission. Furthermore, in the framework of TICSA-II, 6,924 services, including non-formal education, formal schooling, vocational training and legal assistance, were provided to girls and 4,343 services were provided to boys. The TPR for TICSA-II also indicates that, in Bangladesh, 28 children were withdrawn from exploitative work through the provision of educational services or training opportunities and 4,173 children were prevented from such work. The Committee further notes that, in its concluding observations, the Committee on the Rights of the Child takes note of the initiative started with the "One Stop Crisis Centres" for victims and of the fact that the Ministry of Women and Children Affairs (MOWCA) set-up a Subcommittee on recovery and rehabilitation (CRC/C/OPSC/BDG/CO/1, paragraph 34). Moreover, the Committee notes that the TPR for TICSA-II indicates that the National Anti-Trafficking Strategic Plan of Action (NATSPA) is still pending approval. The Committee finally notes that in the framework of the ILO-IPEC Time-bound Programme (TBP), one of the major components of the TBP is the implementation of programmes to combat the unconditional worst forms of child labour, including child trafficking for labour and sexual exploitation. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in adopting the NATSPA and in elaborating the child trafficking intervention component in the framework of the TBP. It also requests the Government to provide information on the impact of these programmes once implemented, particularly in terms of the number of children prevented from being the victims of trafficking and the number of child victims removed from this worst form of child labour. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of child victims of trafficking who were rehabilitated and socially integrated through the "One Stop Crisis Centres" and the Subcommittee on recovery and rehabilitation.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Penalties. The Committee had previously noted that section 6(1) of the SVWCA provides for sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties of imprisonment and fines for the sale and trafficking of children. It had noted the Government's information that there are at least 33 tribunals where special judges are appointed to deal with cases of trafficking. However, despite successes in the punishment of traffickers, public corruption is still widespread, the court system is slow and traffickers are often charged with lesser crimes, such as crossing borders without proper documentation.

The Committee notes that, according to the trafficking report of 2008, Government efforts to criminally address trafficking improved in some areas. The Government opened 123 investigations, made 106 arrests and initiated 101 prosecutions of sex trafficking offences. However, the trafficking report of 2008 indicates that the Government reported 20 trafficking convictions in 2007, 23 fewer than the previous year. Life imprisonment sentences were imposed on 18 of the convicted traffickers and the remaining two convicted traffickers received sentences of 14 and ten years' imprisonment. The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations, the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed its concern at the inadequate implementation of existing laws and recommended that the Government take all the necessary measures to ensure that the existing legislation is adequately implemented (CRC/C/OPSC/BDG/CO/1, paragraphs 8–9). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that persons who traffic in children are prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. In this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to continue providing information on the number and nature of infringements reported, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Identifying and reaching to children at special risk. Child domestic workers. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that, according to the World Confederation of Labour (WCL), child domestics worked in conditions that resemble servitude. It had noted the Government's statement, in reply to the comments made by the WCL, that forced labour is prohibited by virtue of article 34 of the Constitution and that child domestics were usually well-treated and were not subject to forced or bonded labour. The Committee had noted that, in Dhaka City alone, there were an estimated 300,000 child domestic workers. It had noted the Government's statement that the recent study conducted by the ILO in 2006 on the conditions of domestic servants in Bangladesh under the TBP revealed that more than 90 per cent of domestic servants expressed satisfaction with their jobs and employers and did not want to leave their jobs. The Committee had noted the Government's statement that in Bangladesh child domestic workers cannot be considered as being involved in the worst forms of child labour. The Committee had nevertheless considered that child domestic workers often fall prey to exploitation, which can take various forms.

In this regard, the Committee notes that, according to the TBP, child domestics constitute a high-risk group. They are outside the normal reach of labour controls and are scattered and isolated within the households in which they work. This isolation, together with the children's dependency on their employers, lays the ground for potential abuse and exploitation. One of the key issues distinguishing domestic labour from other types of child labour is the 24-hour nature of the job. Employers expect the children to do domestic work at any time of day or night, whenever needed. The long hours, low or no wages, poor food, overwork and hazards implicit in the working conditions affect the children's physical health. The Committee notes the Government's statement that it has elaborated some guidelines to protect child domestic workers from the worst forms of child labour. The Government also indicates that it is expected that some specific policies will be made concerning the working conditions of child domestic workers. The Committee requests the Government to provide more concrete information on the guidelines to protect child domestic workers and on their impact on protecting child domestic workers from the worst forms of child labour. It also requests the Government to provide information on the policies it intends to adopt concerning the working conditions of child domestic workers. In this regard, the Committee expresses the firm hope that these policies will ensure that child domestic workers under 18 years of age do not perform any type of the worst forms of child labour.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations, the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed regret that data on the extent of the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography and on the number of children involved in these activities is very limited, mainly due to the absence of a comprehensive data collection system (CRC/C/OPSC/BGD/CO/1, paragraph 6). The Committee notes, however, that according to the technical progress report of 22 February 2007 for the TBP, the Bangladesh Bureau of Statistics conducted 13 research studies on different thematic areas, including internal and cross-border trafficking, in the framework of the TBP preparatory phase. The Committee requests the Government to provide statistical data on the trafficking of children collected through the research study on internal and cross-border trafficking.

The Committee is also addressing a request directly to the Government concerning other points.

Bolivia

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee notes with regret that for the third consecutive year the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Medical examination for fitness for employment. The Committee noted Decision No. 001 of 11 May 2004, issued by the Ministers of Labour and of Health and Sports (SEDES), section 1 of which provides that the Ministry of Health and Sports, through its ministries and municipal authorities, shall allocate the necessary and adequate medical personnel so that, in coordination with the Ministry of Labour, free medical examinations are carried out of the fitness for employment of working boys, girls and young persons in the industrial and agricultural sectors and for own account work, in urban and rural areas, in application of section 137(1)(b) of the Code on Boys, Girls and Young Persons of 1999. In this respect, the Committee noted section 137(1)(b) of the Code on Boys, Girls and Young Persons of 1999, under the terms of which young workers shall periodically undergo medical examination. Noting that the medical examinations envisaged under section 1 of Decision No. 001 of 11 May 2004 appear to refer solely to the periodical medical examinations of young persons to be carried out during employment, the Committee reminded the Government that, in accordance with Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention, no young persons under 18 years of age shall be admitted to employment unless they have been found to be fit for work by a thorough medical examination. Furthermore, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour, with the technical assistance of the Bolivian Standardization and Quality Institute (IBNORCA), has formulated regulations under the General Occupational Safety, Health and Welfare Act on work by young persons in industry, commerce, mining and agriculture. These regulations are due to come into force shortly. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this regard and, on the establishment of thorough medical examination before admission to employment.

With regard to the frequency of the periodical medical examinations (Article 3, paragraphs 2 and 3), the medical examinations required until the age of 21 years in occupations which involve high health risks (Article 4) and the adoption of appropriate measures for the vocational guidance and physical and vocational rehabilitation of young persons found by medical examination to be unsuited to certain types of work or to have physical handicaps or limitations (Article 6), the Committee noted the Government's indication that these subjects have not yet been covered. Nevertheless, the Government indicated that these and other matters envisaged by the Convention would be defined in the regulations on work by young persons issued under the General Occupational Health, Safety and Welfare Act. The Committee therefore hopes that these regulations will be adopted in the near future to give effect to these provisions of the Convention. It once again requests the Government to supply a copy of these regulations as soon as adopted.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee noted that, due to economic constraints, there are certain shortcomings in the application of this Convention, particularly in the capitals of remote departments, such as Cobija and Trinidad, and in rural areas. Nevertheless, the Government was adopting measures, in accordance with the possibilities available to it, so that all young persons who work in the country will progressively be covered by the protection afforded by the Convention. The Committee noted the Government's statement with interest. It once again requests it to continue providing information on the progress achieved in the application of the Convention in practice in the country. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide, if such statistics are available, information concerning the number of children and young persons who are engaged in work and have undergone the periodical medical examinations envisaged in the Convention; extracts from the reports of the inspection services relating to any infringements reported and the penalties imposed; and any other information illustrating the application of the Convention in practice.

Work by young persons in agriculture. Even though the Convention does not cover agricultural work, the Committee noted with interest the draft Presidential Decree regulating the exercise of and compliance with rights and obligations arising out of agricultural employment. Section 28(IV) provides that, before being admitted to employment, young persons shall undergo a free medical examination of fitness for work, which shall be repeated periodically. This provision also requires employers to maintain at the disposal of labour inspectors the corresponding medical certificate of fitness for employment. The Committee considered that this provision reflects the principle set out in Articles 2, 3 and 7 of the Convention with regard to agricultural work. In this respect, the Committee noted that the draft Presidential Decree is currently in the process of being approved by the Economic Policy Analysis Unit (UDAPE), which is a Government technical body responsible for preparing a preliminary report on the relevance of the approval of any legal provision by the Cabinet of Ministers. The Committee once again asks the Government to include provisions in the above draft relating to the intervals at which medical examinations shall be carried out (Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Convention).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 78) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee notes with regret that for the third consecutive year the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 7, paragraph 2, of the Convention. With regard to the methods of identification or other methods of supervision to be adopted for ensuring the application of the system of medical examination for fitness for employment to children and young persons engaged either on their own account or on account of their parents in itinerant trading or in any other occupation carried on in the streets, the Committee requests the Government to take into consideration, when taking the legislative or regulatory measures on the basis of the analysis of the results obtained from the VALORA Plan, the indications contained in Recommendation No. 79 on the medical examination of young persons particularly Paragraph 14 on methods of supervision.

Moreover, the Committee invites the Government to refer to its comments under Convention No. 77.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1997)

Article 6 of the Convention. Apprenticeship. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that under sections 28 and 58 of the General Labour Act, children under 14 years of age may work as apprentices, whether paid or unpaid. It also noted that sections 137 and 138 of the 1999 Code regulate apprenticeship but specify no minimum age for admission to apprenticeship. The Committee asked the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that no one under 14 years of age is engaged in an apprenticeship.

In its report, the Government indicates that labour inspectors are responsible for implementing measures to ensure that children under 14 years of age are not engaged in apprenticeships. They have a form prescribed by certain provisions of the national legislation governing the supervision of work. Furthermore, four labour inspectors have received training and are specialized in child labour issues. The Committee acknowledges that measures to reinforce the labour inspection services are essential in combating child labour. However, for their work, labour inspectors need a basis in law consistent with the Convention enabling them to ensure that children are protected against conditions of work liable to jeopardize their health or their development. The abovementioned provisions of the national legislation governing the age of admission to apprenticeship are not consistent with the Convention. The Committee reminds the Government that, according to Article 6, the Convention does not apply to work done in enterprises by persons of at least 14 years of age when it is carried out in the context of a programme of education, training or vocational guidance, in accordance with conditions prescribed by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned.

The Committee accordingly asks the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the provisions of the national legislation that regulate the age of admission to apprenticeship so as to provide that no one under 14 years of age is engaged in an apprenticeship, as required by Article 6 of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Debt bondage and forced or compulsory labour. Child labour in sugar cane and brazil nut harvesting. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of a communication from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), indicating that child labour in the sugar cane and brazil nut sectors is a practice similar to slavery because the children have no alternative but to work with their parents, so like their parents they are subject to a system of debt bondage. Furthermore, although their work is neither recognized nor remunerated, they have joint liability with their parents for the debt and are compelled to work to help their parents to repay it.

In its comments, the ITUC stated that more than 10,000 children work with their parents in the sugar harvest in Bolivia. Of these, around 7,000 work in Santa Cruz, half of whom are between 9 and 13 years of age, and 3,000 work in Tarija. They perform a variety of tasks. For example, boys work with the men in cutting sugar cane and girls and young children work with the women in gathering, stripping and bundling the cane. The children work in difficult conditions and their hours are very long – more than 12 hours a day, starting at 5 a.m. They suffer from respiratory ailments and wound themselves working with machetes. As to brazil nut harvesting, the ITUC stated that children start at age 7 to help their parents in the plantations, assisting with picking and processing the fruit. At harvest time, the children work in the jungle alongside their parents. The work they do is hazardous because they use machetes to crack the nuts and extract the kernels. Moreover, they have to walk for hours to find the trees bearing nuts. Work begins at around 3 a.m. or even 2 a.m. and ends at midday. In some places the children work after school or during the night between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m.

The Committee took note of a study Enganche y Servidumbre por Deudas en Bolivia (Entrapment and Debt Bondage in Bolivia), published by the Office in January 2005, which reports such practices. According to the study, the situation of tens of thousands of indigenous agricultural workers in Bolivia is one of debt bondage, with some of them subjected to permanent or semi-permanent forced labour. The study also reports that these practices are to be found not only in the Chaco region but also in the areas of Santa Cruz and Tarija (sugar harvesting) and the northern Amazon area (brazil nut harvesting).

The Committee notes the Government's information on Bolivia's legislation covering slavery or similar practices. Its notes, however, that although the legislation appears to be consistent with the Convention on this point, work by children under 18 years of age in conditions of debt bondage or forced labour is a problem in practice. The Committee expresses its deep concern at the situation of these children. It reminds the Government that under Article 3(a) of the Convention, all forms of slavery or similar practices such as debt bondage and forced or compulsory labour are considered to be among the worst forms of child labour and that pursuant to Article 1, immediate and effective measures must be taken to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure, as a matter of urgency, that the persons using the labour of children under 18 years of age in the sugar cane and brazil nut harvesting industry in conditions of debt bondage or forced labour, are prosecuted and that effective and dissuasive sanctions are applied to them. It requests the Government in this connection on the effect given to the provisions that apply to these worst forms of child labour, including statistics on the number and nature of offences reported, the investigations held, prosecutions, and the sentences and penal sanctions applied.

Clause (d). Hazardous work. Children working in mines. In its comments, the ITUC stated that in the departments of Ururo, Potosi and La Paz, more than 3,800 children work in the tin, zinc, silver and gold mines. As a rule, the older boys work with their fathers in the mines, whereas the younger children help to transport rocks and tools and to gather rocks. Children working in the rivers of the gold mines are engaged in extracting and washing gold deposits. The rivers are contaminated with mercury, sulphur and other chemicals used in mining. Furthermore, because they are small, children aged 8 to 12 years are sent into certain narrow parts of the mine where an adult would not be able to pass through. They also work in extracting ore and preparing and exploding dynamite. Sometimes, in mines where there are no wagons to shift heavy ore, the children have to carry it on their shoulders to the ore processing area. In the first stage of processing, the children have to handle a tool – a very heavy stone that can weigh up to 60 kilos, which they balance with the help of a metal plank on smaller stones. In the second phase, they have to recover the remaining ore, which is mixed with chemicals, and are in danger of getting burnt and inhaling toxic gases.

The Committee notes that section 134 of the Code on Children and Young People contains a detailed list of types of hazardous work prohibited for young people, some of which are related to the work done by children in mines including the transport of heavy loads, the handling or inhaling of toxic products and the handling of dangerous tools or explosives. The Committee expresses concern at the use of child labour in hazardous work in mines. It reminds the Government that, according to Article 3(d) of the Convention, hazardous work is among the worst forms of child labour. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps as a matter of urgency to ensure that no child under 18 years of age shall engage in hazardous work in mining. It also requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the legislation governing hazardous work, including statistics on the number and nature of offences reported, the investigations held, prosecutions, the sentences and penalties applied.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. The Committee takes due note of the information sent by the Government to the effect that two inspectors specializing in child labour have been assigned to the regions of Santa Cruz and Tarija-Bermejo to conduct inspections in the sugar cane industry. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results of those inspections particularly as regards the protection of children working in the sugar cane industry.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing children from being engaged in worst forms of child labour and removing them therefrom. 1. Debt bondage and forced and compulsory labour. Child labour in the sugar cane and brazil nut harvesting industry. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest the information from the Government to the effect that ten education centres have been set up in six camps in the municipality of Bermejo that accommodate families who work harvesting sugar cane. These centres have benefited 300 children. It further notes that an education strategy has been put into effect by the Ministry of Labour and the Fundación Hombres Nuevos, in collaboration with UNICEF, in ten municipalities in the sugar cane area of Santa Cruz. More than 3,000 girls and boys and their families, and 60 teachers from education units are to benefit from this strategy. One outcome expected is a 50 to 80 per cent increase in the school attendance rate.

The Committee also notes the adoption of the Three Year Plan for the Gradual Elimination of Child Labour (2006–08) (“Three Year Plan 2006–08”), which aims to implement effective and sustainable measures to improve implementation of the National Plan on the Gradual Elimination of Child Labour (2000–10) (“PNEPTI 2000–10”), including the elimination of the worst forms of child labour in the sugar cane industry. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to step up its efforts and to take time-bound measures, particularly in implementing the Three Year Plan 2006–08 and PNEPTI 2000–10 to: (a) prevent children from being placed in debt bondage or forced labour in the sugar cane and brazil nut harvesting industry; and (b) provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from these worst forms of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the results obtained. Finally, it requests the Government to send information on the measures taken to ensure the rehabilitation of these children.

2. Child labour in mines. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest the detailed information sent by the Government on the measures taken under the various programmes of action to eliminate child labour in mines. It notes in particular the awareness-raising and educational measures and economic alternatives provided for the families of children working in mines. It further notes with interest that 20 per cent of children who participated in the vocational training programme have stopped working in mines and that 80 per cent of those remaining work fewer hours. It notes that the Three Year Plan 2006–08 and PNEPTI 2000–10 have both set the elimination of child labour in mines as one of their objectives. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts and asks it to take time-bound measures, in particular under the Three Year Plan 2006–08 and PNEPTI 2000–10 to provide for necessary and appropriate direct assistance to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of the children concerned. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results obtained.

Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. Indigenous children. The Committee noted previously the information from the Government to the effect that in the large estates of the Chaco region, families of the Bolivian Guarani communities are subjected to debt bondage. As a result of this practice, the children of the families are in the same situation. It further noted that a national action plan to eliminate forced labour was to be adopted. It took into account the problems of the families of Guarani communities who are subjected to debt bondage, and specific measures were to be taken for the children under 18 years of age who are also in debt bondage. The Committee notes that the plan has not yet been adopted. It nonetheless takes due note of the Government’s information that it has adopted a Provisional Interministerial Plan 2007–08 for the Guarani people. The Committee observes that the children of indigenous peoples often fall victim to exploitation, which can take many forms, and are at risk of falling into the worst forms of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the time-bound measures taken under the Provisional Interministerial Plan 2007–08 for the Guarani people, in order to prevent the children of these people falling into debt bondage or forced or compulsory labour. The Committee also requests the Government to provide a copy of the National Plan for the Elimination of Forced Labour as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Bulgaria

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Article 5 of the Convention. Monitoring mechanisms. Social assistance service. The Committee previously noted the Government’s information that the Social Assistance Agency (SAA) is an important party to the agreement towards the implementation of the National Strategy for Protection of the Rights of Children on the Street. The Committee further noted that the SAA conducts monthly monitoring of the activities of the Child Protection Departments with regard to child beggars and street children, and that the SAA helps the Child Protection Departments in identifying unaccompanied children abroad or child victims of trafficking. The Committee notes with interest in the Government’s report that, in late 2005, on a proposal from the State Agency for Child Protection (SACP) and with the cooperation of the International Organization for Migration, a coordination mechanism for referring and servicing cases of unaccompanied Bulgarian children and child victims of trafficking on their return from abroad was adopted. From the introduction in November 2005 of this coordination mechanism until July 2007, the SACP has worked on some 230 cases of unaccompanied Bulgarian children or child victims of trafficking from abroad, with the number of referent cases for the entire 2007 year being 102. From the start of 2008 until the date of the Government's report, the SACP has been working on 30 new such cases. The Committee further notes that in June 2008, the Agreement on monitoring child labour (Agreement), of April 2003, was renewed between the SACP and the General Labour Inspectorate – Executive Agency and the SAA has now also joined this agreement. The Agreement was drafted in accordance with the adopted ILO principles, the requirements of the European Agency on the Protection of Young People at Work and the Memorandum of Understanding between the Bulgarian Government and the ILO. Its principle objective is, through the creation of appropriate mechanisms for coordination and cooperation between the three institutions and other acceding parties, to increase the effectiveness of the activities of all partners from the governmental and non-governmental sector, as well of the social partners, on the monitoring of child labour. The top priorities of the Agreement are: (a) building a culture for preventing the involvement of children in the worst forms of child labour; (b) the mutual exchange of information on the issues of children's rights and the use of child labour; (c) the development of a legal basis for protecting the labour of children up to 18 years of age; and (d) the creation of a system for monitoring child labour on the whole territory of the country. The parties to the Agreement reported that the use of child labour in Bulgaria has been decreasing progressively, though still remains a challenge mostly in the small and medium-sized enterprises, as well as in the sectors of the informal economy and domestic farms. The parties further agreed to periodically revise the Agreement. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of unaccompanied children and child victims of trafficking identified and registered by the SAA or the SACP, the measures taken to protect such children and the results achieved.

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. National Action Plan against the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's information that the main objective of the National Action Plan is to adopt effective measures against sexual exploitation leading to the elimination of child pornography, prostitution, sexual bondage, sexual tourism, trafficking and trading of children, and providing rehabilitative measures for child victims of such exploitation. The Committee notes in the Government's report that the main priorities of the SAA since its inception are the prevention of: violence; the worst forms of child labour; trafficking; and the sexual exploitation of children. The Committee notes with interest the following measures taken by the SACP. The SACP commenced development of a specialized web site on counteracting the commercial sexual exploitation of children. The main purpose of the web site is to provide thorough information on the problems of sexual and labour exploitation such as: national legislation; international standards; national documents; and practices. The web site also has a form for submitting information, through which 450 cases of children's rights violations were forwarded and for which actions are being taken immediately on carrying out inspections and, if needed, in referring the cases to the competent authorities. In 2007, the SACP has worked on 203 such received cases and, in the period from January to July 2008, 174 such cases were submitted, of which 150 are new. The Committee also notes in the Government's report that, since 2006, the SACP is a member of the public council under the telephone hotline for the fight against illegal and damaging content in the Bulgarian Internet space and, as such, receives information from the public concerning materials of a pornographic nature or concerning violence to children. Furthermore, on 11 May 2005, the Ethic Code for the prevention of trafficking and sexual exploitation of children in the field of tourism was signed by the SACP, the Animus Association, as well as representatives of the country's tourist industry. The aim of the Ethic Code, which is available on the SACP web site, is to introduce a new approach to fighting child trafficking by motivating the private sector, especially the representatives of the tourist industry, to introduce measures for the prevention of the sexual exploitation of children by Bulgarian and foreign tourists. Finally, the Committee notes the development of a National Telephone Hotline for Children, in November 2007, by the SACP and the Bulgarian representation of UNICEF. It provides crisis intervention, consultation, specialized information on children's rights, and redirects to suitable providers of services and child protection units and social protection units. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the impact of these various measures in preventing and eliminating the commercial sexual exploitation of children.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Social investment for children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's information that, with the aim to enhance access to education for all children, including those from families with low incomes, the Government adopted amendments to the Family Benefits for Children Act (FACA), according to which a new type of allowance depending on the school attendance of children was introduced. "Social investment for children" for their upbringing, education, socialization and health care was also introduced by the FACA. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the number of children who benefited from this programme. The Committee notes in the Government's report that, in the first six months of 2008, the monthly average of assistance, in the form of social investments under section 7 of the FACA, was provided to 423 families with 562 children, in the average monthly amount of 8,105 Bulgarian leva (BGN). For the same period of 2007, the assistance provided was to 328 families with 430 children and an average of BGN6,407 per month. The assistance granted covers total or partial expenses for things including: fees for crèches or kindergartens; canteen food; clothing and footwear; and school supplies. Monthly assistance also exists under section 8 of the FACA in the form of social investments for children. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of children who benefited from programmes such as the "social investment for children" programme.

Clause (b). Necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child victims of trafficking. The Committee notes in the Government's report that there are five crisis centres in the country. In the period from 2007 to July 2008, approximately 100 children have passed through these centres, which provide a complex of social services aimed at satisfying the daily needs and preparing the social integration of child victims of violence and trafficking. Starting 1 January 2007, the crisis centres fell under state jurisdiction and thus started receiving financing from the state budget. This, in part, amounted to a significant increase of the standards of social services offered, including those by the crisis centres and centres for work with street children. The Committee notes that the basic services provided by the crisis centres are: food and shelter; satisfying health needs; psychological support; life and social skills; participation of the child in a school form of education; and preparation for reintegration into the family or, if impossible, taking an adequate protection measure. The placement of the children in the crisis centres, which have a capacity to accept up to ten children each, is done by the child protection units, under the applicable legal provisions, for a term of up to six months, subject to the individual child's necessities. After their stay in the crisis centres, the children are directed to other services and are actively monitored by child protection units in order to provide adequate support and to prevent a repetition of the same events to them, or other members of their family. The Committee notes with interest that child protection units have carried out monitoring and provided assistance in 35 cases in 2006, 37 cases in 2007, 31 cases in the first quarter of 2008 and in 32 cases in the second quarter of 2008. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of child victims of trafficking withdrawn from the worst forms of child labour and rehabilitated by the crisis centres.

Clause (d). Identify and reach out to children at special risk. Street children. The Committee previously noted that, within the framework of the National Strategy for Protection of the Rights of Children on the Street for 2003–05, an agreement between the SACP, the Ministry of the Interior, and the SAA was signed to regulate the application of the measures for protecting child beggars. The Committee further noted that an action plan for work with begging children was developed and executed in five districts. The Committee notes in the Government's report that an important part of the activities of child protection units is work with street children. The first priority is given to working with the family in assessing the parents' capacity to take care of their children and supporting parents in raising and educating children. The emphasis is put on the individual particularities of the children, as per the methods approved by the SAA and the SACP, and is directed towards preventing children from finding themselves on the streets by developing social services in support of the family. There are currently nine functioning centres working with street children, whose methods, conditions and manners of providing services are approved by the SAA and the SACP who, together in turn, establish minimum services, activities and quality requirements, as well as material supplies, staffing and organization of activities for the centres. Furthermore, there is currently a total capacity of 89 places in five children's shelters, which are viewed as a last resort protection measure and are only called upon after exhausting all other options within the family environment. Finally, the Committee notes with interest that child protection units have mobile teams, comprised of police authorities, representatives of non-governmental organizations and local commissions, surveying the streets in order to identify street children. In the first half of 2008, 1,535 child protection unit mobile teams were operational and for the same time period, 61 newly registered cases of begging children were discovered. As of June 2008, 743 children were in the register of children in need of special protection. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the impact of these measures on protecting street children and child beggars from the worst forms of child labour and the results achieved.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Burkina Faso

Article 3, clause (a), and Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Sale and trafficking of children and sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that there is a high level of trafficking of children for labour exploitation both within the country and as a source of child labour for other countries. The Committee also noted with interest that, since the adoption and implementation of Act No. 038-2003/AN of 27 May 2003 defining and repressing the trafficking of children (Act No. 038-2003/AN of 27 May 2003), 31 cases of trafficking had been prosecuted in the 19 higher courts and 18 individuals had been sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from one to three years.

The Committee notes with interest the adoption of Decree No. 2008-332/PRES of 19 June 2008 promulgating Act No. 029-2008/AN of 15 May 2008 on combating trafficking in persons and similar practices (Act on combating trafficking in persons and similar practices). Under section 26 of this Act, Act No. 038-2003/AN of 27 May 2003 is repealed. The Committee takes due note that sections 3 and 4 of the Act on combating trafficking in persons and similar practices provides for terms of imprisonment ranging from five to 20 years.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that it has continued and stepped up its efforts to combat the trafficking of children. It also notes the several court decisions handed down by the High Court between 2004 and 2007. The Committee notes that the individuals who have been prosecuted for the trafficking of children were found guilty and sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from two to 24 months, sometimes accompanied by a fine, and were ordered to pay costs. The Committee notes, however, that of the seven prison sentences handed down, six were suspended; one person was sentenced to two months' imprisonment and another to a fine of 50,000 CFA francs. The Committee reminds the Government that the trafficking of children is a serious crime and that, under Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention, the Government is obliged to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect the Convention, including the application of sufficiently effective and dissuasive penal sanctions. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the penalties imposed on individuals found guilty of trafficking of children are sufficiently effective and dissuasive and that they are applied in practice. It requests the Government to provide information in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on the application in practice of the Act on combating trafficking in persons and similar practices, including in particular, statistics on the number and nature of violations reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions imposed.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause(b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of labour. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee previously took due note of the information provided concerning the implementation in the country of the ILO–IPEC Programme on Combating Trafficking in Children for Labour Exploitation in West and Central Africa (LUTRENA) and noted, in particular, that 632 children had benefited from the project and from educational support. It requested the Government to continue providing information on the measures taken in the context of the implementation of the LUTRENA programme. The Committee notes with interest the information provided by the Government that 716 children have been intercepted and returned to their families with the support of the social, technical and financial partners, including the vigilance committees. It also notes the Government's indication that, to ensure better care for victims of trafficking and their reintegration into their families, transit centres have been equipped with facilities in the three provinces of Fada, Pama and Diapaga. The Committee also notes that financial assistance is given to families of child victims of trafficking for income-generating activities and the children are placed in workshops and various vocational training centres or reintegrated into the school system. Furthermore, the Wend Zodo reception centre has been renovated and four literacy centres have been equipped with facilities. Finally, the Committee notes that the country is participating in phase V of the LUTRENA programme. The Committee takes due note of the measures taken by the Government to remove children from sale and trafficking and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration, which it regards as a manifestation of its political will to eliminate this worst form of child labour. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts and requests it to provide information on the time-bound measures taken in the context of the implementation of phase V of the LUTRENA programme to remove child victims from sale and trafficking by indicating, in particular, the number of children who have actually been removed from this worst form of labour, and on the specific rehabilitation and social integration measures taken for these children.

2. Project for small-scale gold mines in West Africa. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Burkina Faso is participating in the ILO–IPEC project entitled “Prevention and elimination of child labour in artisanal gold mining in West Africa (2005-2008)” (the ILO–IPEC project on artisanal gold mining), the objective of which is to remove children from gold mines, while establishing structures to prevent child labour and to support local activities, particularly those aimed at enhancing the safety and boosting the income of adults working in the mines. The Committee noted that, according to the information contained in the 2007 ILO–IPEC activity report on the project in small-scale gold mines, more than 240 children had been prevented from being employed in hazardous work in gold mines and were receiving a school education.

The Committee notes with interest the detailed information provided by the Government concerning the ILO–IPEC project on artisanal gold mining which has been implemented on the gold-bearing site of Gorol Kadjè in Séno and the gold-bearing site of Zinguima in Bam. It notes, in particular, that two small schooling programmes have been implemented which have allowed the schooling of 248 children, including 130 girls, namely 93 children on the Zinguima site in Bam by the NGO Coalition in Burkina Faso for Children's Rights (COBUFADE) and 155 children on the Gorol Kadjè site in Séno by the NGO Action for the Promotion of Children's Rights in Burkina Faso (APRODEB). Overall, 657 children have been removed from the worst forms of labour in gold washing and have benefited from pre-school and school services, support in the form of school equipment, school clothing and afternoon snacks, and medical care. Furthermore, 16 groups of villagers have been created for income-generating activities in animal fattening, trading, dyeing and soap manufacture, including six groups of women and two groups of girls.

The Committee notes that two ILO–IPEC programmes are currently being implemented in the country, namely a programme on the rehabilitation and integration of child gold washers on the gold-bearing site of Gorol Kadjè through education and vocational training, and another which concerns support for the schooling of 310 children and the integration of 90 child workers, the protection of 120 child workers in the context of three young person clubs, support for income-generating activities for 90 mothers of gold-washing children and the mobilization of the community on the Zinguima site. Finally, the Committee notes that a basic study on child labour in gold washing in Zinguima and Gorol Kadjè is being carried out in the country. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to remove children from the worst forms of child labour in small-scale gold mines. It also requests it to continue providing information on the time-bound measures taken, particularly in the context of the implementation of the two ILO–IPEC programmes currently under way in the country, to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from this worst form of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration.

Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the basic study on child labour in gold washing in Ziniguima and Gorol Kadjè as soon as it has been completed.

Clause (e). Taking account of the special situation of girls. The Committee previously noted that, according to ILO-IPEC information on the LUTRENA programme, internal trafficking, which accounts for 70 per cent of cases, mainly concerns girls who are engaged in domestic labour or working as street vendors in the country's major cities. It noted that girls, particularly those employed in domestic work, are often victims of exploitation, which takes on very diverse forms, and it is difficult to monitor their conditions of employment because of the unauthorized nature of this work. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken in the context of the LUTRENA programme to protect girls against labour and sexual exploitation. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning the measures it has taken in the context of the ILO-IPEC project on artisanal gold mining to take into account the situation of girls, in particular through financial assistance for income-generating activities and their insertion into training centres to learn a trade or their reintegration into the school system. The Committee notes, however, that no information is provided with regard to the measures taken in the context of the LUTRENA programme. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on the time-bound measures taken in the context of the implementation of phase V of the LUTRENA programme to protect girls from the worst forms of child labour, including, in particular, the number of girl victims of sale and trafficking for labour or sexual exploitation who have actually been removed from this worst form.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. 1. Regional cooperation. The Committee previously noted that the Government has signed bilateral cooperation agreements on the cross-border trafficking of children with the Republic of Mali and multilateral cooperation agreements on combating the trafficking of children in West Africa. It requested the Government to provide information on the implementation of these agreements. The Committee notes the Government's indication that statistics will be provided as soon as they are available. The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will be able to provide information in its next report and once again requests it to indicate whether the information exchanges with the other signatory countries have made it possible to: (1) apprehend and arrest persons operating in networks engaged in the trafficking of children; and (2) detect and intercept child victims of trafficking in the border areas.

2. Poverty elimination. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the draft Decent Work Country Programme for Burkina Faso. It noted that the problems connected with child labour form part of the priorities of this country programme, including child labour in rural areas and in mines, and that the Government intends to take measures aimed at eliminating child labour in the context of poverty reduction. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide any information on this matter. Noting once again that poverty reduction programmes contribute to breaking the poverty cycle, which is essential for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in the context of the implementation of the Decent Work Country Programme to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, particularly as regards the actual reduction of poverty among child victims of sale and trafficking and those who carry out hazardous work in mines and quarries.

Furthermore, the Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Burundi

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indication by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that child labour constitutes a serious problem in Burundi, particularly in agriculture and informal activities in urban areas. It also noted the statement by the Government that the socio-political crisis experienced by the country had aggravated the situation of children, some of whom were obliged to perform work "illegally" to support their families, very frequently in the informal economy and in agriculture. The Committee noted that section 3 of the Labour Code, in conjunction with section 14, prohibits work by young persons under 16 years of age in public and private enterprises, including farms, where such work is carried out on behalf of and under the supervision of an employer.

In its report, the Government confirms that the country's regulations do not apply to the informal sector, which consequently escapes any control. Nevertheless, the question of extending the application of the labour legislation to this sector is to be discussed in a tripartite context on the occasion of the revision of the Labour Code and its implementing texts. The Committee reminds the Government that the Convention applies to all sectors of economic activity and covers all forms of employment and work, whether or not there is a contractual employment relationship, including own-account work. It expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to extend the scope of application of the Convention to work performed outside an employment relationship, particularly in the informal economy and in agriculture. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted the ITUC's indications that the war had weakened the education system due to the destruction of many schools and the death or abduction of a large number of teachers. According to the ITUC, the school attendance rate is lower and the illiteracy rate higher for girls. The Committee further noted that, according to a report of the International Bureau of Education (UNESCO) of 2004 relating to data on education, Legislative Decree No. 1/025 of 13 July 1989 reorganizing education in Burundi does not provide for free and compulsory primary education. Entry into primary education is around the age of 7 or 8 years and lasts six years. Children therefore complete primary education around the age of 13 or 14 years and then have to pass a competition to enter secondary education. The Committee further noted that in 1996 the Government had prepared a Global Plan of Action for Education designed to improve the education system, among other measures, by reducing inequalities and disparities in access to education and achieving a gross school attendance rate of 100 per cent by the year 2010.

The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government in its report with regard to the various measures adopted in the field of education. It notes that, under article 53(2) of the Constitution of 2005, the State is under the obligation to organize public education and promote access to such education. It further notes that basic education is free of charge and that the number of children attending school tripled during the 2006 school year. In 2007, primary schools will be constructed and other mobile and temporary schools will be established. Furthermore, coordination units for girls' education have been established and over 1,000 teachers recruited. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts in the field of education and to provide information on the impact of the above measures in terms of increasing the school attendance rate and reducing the drop-out rate, with special attention to the situation of girls. It also requests the Government to indicate the age of completion of compulsory schooling and the provisions of the national legislation which determine this age.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. In its comments under Convention No. 29, the Committee noted previously that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations on the initial report of the Government (CRC/C/15/Add.133, October 2000), expressed concern at the use of children by the State as soldiers or helpers in camps or in obtaining information. The Committee on the Rights of the Child also expressed concern at the low minimum age for recruitment to the armed forces and at the widespread recruitment of children by opposition armed forces and the sexual exploitation of children by members of the armed forces. Moreover, the Committee of Experts noted that in March 2003 the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) made comments on the application of the Convention confirming the use of child soldiers by the armed forces.

The Committee noted that, in its comments, the COSYBU indicates that armed conflicts persist, maintained by the Partie pour la libération du peuple Hutu/Forces nationales pour la libération of Agathon Rwaswa (PALIPEHUTU/FNL) and that children continue to be enrolled. It also noted the information provided by the Government in reply to COSYBU's comments according to which, following the signature of the Arusha Peace and Reconciliation Agreement in August 2000 and the Comprehensive Ceasefire Agreement signed with the Conseil national pour la défense de la démocratie/Forces pour la défense de la démocratie (CNDD/FDD) of Pierre Nkurunziza, the phenomenon of children being used in armed conflict has almost ended and the integration of these children into social and economic life is continuing. The Government adds that the forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict is the worst form of child labour observed most commonly in Burundi. However, considering the relative calm that is being experienced over most of the national territory, it has launched the implementation of a vast programme for the demobilization and reintegration of former combatants through three organizations, namely: the National Commission for Demobilization, Reinsertion and Reintegration (CNDRR), the National Structure for Child Soldiers (SEN) and the ILO-IPEC project on the "Prevention and reintegration of children involved in armed conflicts: An interregional programme". Furthermore, according to the Government, all children have been demobilized except those used by the armed movement FNL (Front national de libération) of Agathon Rwaswa, which has not yet laid down its arms.

The Committee noted that, in his Report on Children and Armed Conflicts in Burundi of 27 October 2006 (S/2006/851), the United Nations Secretary-General indicates that, despite the substantial progress achieved in addressing the grave violations of children's rights, violations are still occurring and the competent authorities have not always conducted criminal investigations nor punished those responsible. During the period from August 2005 to September 2006, the United Nations Operation in Burundi (UNOB) identified over 300 cases of child victims of grave violations, perpetrated mainly by members of the FNL and FND troops, including the murder and mutilation of children, serious sexual violence and the recruitment and use of children in armed groups and forces, with an increase of this latter violation being noted (paragraph 25). The Secretary-General adds that the authorities have not yet adopted national legislation to criminalize the recruitment and use of child soldiers (paragraph 36). Furthermore, according to the information contained in the Report of the Secretary-General of 27 October 2006, a ceasefire agreement was signed between the Government and Agathon Rwaswa's FNL, the last active rebel movement, on 7 September 2006 (paragraph 5). Nevertheless, in his ninth report on the United Nations Operation in Burundi of 18 December 2006 (S/2006/994), the Secretary-General indicates that the implementation of the Comprehensive Ceasefire Agreement has remained stalled since its signature (paragraphs 1 and 2).

The Committee noted that, in the information provided under Convention No. 29, the Government indicates that the minimum age for enrolment in the armed forces of Burundi has been increased from 16 to 18 years. It also noted that, according to the information contained on the Internet site of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict (www.un.org/children/conflict/english/home6.html), following her visit to the country, the Government of Burundi has made progress in the protection of children affected by conflict. In this respect, the Committee noted that the Penal Code has been amended to bring its provisions into harmony with the international instruments on human rights ratified by Burundi and that the proposed changes include provisions relating to the protection of children and against war crimes. The Penal Code now provides that the recruitment of children under 16 years of age in armed conflicts constitutes a war crime. The Committee reminds the Government that under Article 3(a) of the Convention, the forced or compulsory recruitment of children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour. It therefore requests the Government to take measures as a matter of urgency to amend the national legislation and prohibit the forced recruitment of young persons under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict, either in the national armed forces or in rebel groups, and to provide information in this respect.

The Committee noted that, despite the measures adopted by the Government, the forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflicts still occurs and that the situation in Burundi remains fragile. It expressed great concern at the current situation, particularly since the persistence of this worst form of child labour gives rise to other violations of the rights of the child, such as the murder and mutilation of children and sexual violence. In this respect, the Committee refers to the Report of the Secretary-General on Children and Armed Conflict in Burundi and requests the Government to take all the necessary measures to continue negotiations with a view to reaching a definitive peace agreement, putting an end unconditionally to the recruitment of children and undertaking the immediate and complete demobilization of all children. Finally, with reference to the Security Council which, in resolution 1612 of 26 July 2005, recalls "the responsibilities of States to end impunity and to prosecute those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other egregious crimes perpetrated against children", the Committee urges the Government to ensure that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed on persons found guilty of enrolling or using young persons under 18 years of age in armed conflict.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of children for prostitution. In its communication, the COSYBU indicated that the extreme poverty of the population encourages parents to allow their children to engage in prostitution. In its report, the Government indicated that cases of the use of children for prostitution have been reported in the popular districts of the municipality of Bujumbura (Bwiza and Buyenzi). However, the juvenile police reacted rapidly and eradicated this phenomenon, with penalties being imposed on persons who recruited children for prostitution. The Committee noted that, in the report of 19 September 2006 of the United Nations independent expert on the situation of human rights in Burundi (A/61/360), the Secretary-General indicated that more and more children are victims of sexual violence (paragraph 82). The Committee noted that sections 372 and 373 of the Penal Code penalize the use, procuring or offering of children who are minors for prostitution, even with their consent. The Committee noted that, even though the national legislation prohibits this worst form of child labour, the use, procuring or offering of children for prostitution remains a problem in practice. It requests the Government to renew its efforts to implement these provisions effectively in practice and to ensure the protection of young persons under 18 years of age against prostitution. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect, including reports on the number of convictions. It also requests the Government to indicate whether the national legislation contains provisions criminalizing the client in the event of prostitution.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of children for illicit activities. Street children. In its communication, the COSYBU indicated that the extreme poverty of the population drives parents to allow their children to engage in begging. In his Report on Children and Armed Conflict in Burundi of 27 October 2006 (S/2006/851), the Secretary-General indicated that UNOB and its partner child protection agencies have received information on the recruitment of from three to ten male children per month, including street children in Bujumbura Mairie Province (paragraph 2 5). As the national legislation does not appear to regulate this activity, the Committee expresses grave concern at the increase in street children who are exposed to numerous risks, including being used or recruited for armed conflict or other illicit activities. It reminds the Government that, in accordance with Article 1 of the Convention, it is under the obligation to take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to protect street children and to prohibit in the national legislation the use, procuring or offering of children for illicit activities. It also requests the Government to establish penalties for this purpose.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from these worst forms and providing for their rehabilitation and social integration. 1. Child soldiers. The Committee noted with interest that the Government is participating in the ILO-IPEC interregional project on the prevention and reintegration of children involved in armed conflict, which also includes the Congo, Rwanda, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Philippines, Sri Lanka and Colombia. The objective of the programme is to prevent the recruitment of children in armed conflict, facilitate their removal and ensure their social integration. The Committee noted the detailed information provided by the Government in its report on the measures that it has taken with organizations to prevent the recruitment of children in armed conflict or to remove them from this worst form of child labour. It noted that, in the context of the ILO-IPEC interregional project, over 15 programmes of action have been implemented and that around 1,440 children have been demobilized in the areas covered by the project. The Committee further noted that, in his ninth report on the United Nations Operation in Burundi of 18 December 2006 (S/2006/994), the Secretary-General indicates that, since November 2003, the United Nations project for the demobilization, reintegration and prevention of the recruitment of children associated with armed forces and groups has freed and reintegrated 3,015 children (paragraph 27). It further noted that the National Structure for Child Soldiers is a project for the demobilization, reintegration and prevention of the recruitment of child soldiers which has been in operation since 2003. In the context of this programme, 1,932 children had been demobilized.

The Committee noted that the Ministry of National Solidarity, Human Rights and Gender has signed a memorandum of understanding with the Executive Secretariat of the NCDRR. In the context of this agreement, measures are adopted at different levels to raise the awareness of the various target groups with regard to the problem of recruitment (members of military forces, combatants, parents, young persons, the civil administration, civil society, NGOs and politicians) and to institutionalize training on the rights and protection of the child in armed conflicts within the training structures of the national army. Furthermore, children who had been demobilized and were exposed to the risk of being recruited once again are monitored. The Committee encouraged the Government to continue collaborating with the various bodies involved in the process of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration with a view to removing children from armed forces and groups. It requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures adopted in the context of the implementation of the ILO-IPEC interregional programme on the prevention and reintegration of children involved in armed conflict with a view to preventing children from being enrolled in armed conflict and to remove them from this worst form of child labour. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the time-bound measures adopted for the rehabilitation and social integration of children who are in practice removed from armed forces or groups.

2. Sexual exploitation. Considering that a number of children are the victims of sexual exploitation as noted under Article 3(b), the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to remove young persons under 18 years of age from prostitution. It also requests the Government to envisage measures to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of children removed from this worst form of child labour.

Clause (c). Ensuring access to free basic education and vocational training for all children removed from the worst forms of child labour. The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government to the effect that, during the 2004–05 school year, a total of 485 former child soldiers were reintegrated into primary school, 99 were oriented towards secondary school, 79 in technical training centres and 74 in training from craft workers. It once again strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to provide access to basic education or vocational training to children removed from armed conflict. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on this subject.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. Street children. The Committee noted that in his report of 23 September 2005 (E/CN.4/2006/109), the United Nations independent expert on the human rights situation in Burundi indicates that the situation of children in the country remains extremely worrying. Children are affected not only by the continuing conflict, but also by the deteriorating economic situation (paragraph 55). According to some estimates, there are over 3,000 street children in the country.

It also noted that, in the report of 19 September 2006 of the independent expert on the situation of human rights in Burundi (A/61/360), the Secretary-General indicates that the phenomenon of street children is on the rise in Bujumbura and that a programme aimed at curbing the trend has been elaborated and includes aspects relating to prevention, assistance and reintegration (paragraph 79). Recalling that street children are particularly exposed to the worst forms of child labour, the Committee once again encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to protect them from these worst forms. It also requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in the context of the programme to bring an end to this phenomenon, particularly with regard to measures for their rehabilitation and social integration.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Cameroon

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the communication from the General Confederation of Labour – Liberty of Cameroon (CGTL) dated 17 October 2008 as well as the Government's report.

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to ILO statistical data on Cameroon for the year 2000, some 442,000 children aged between 10 and 14 years were economically active, of whom 241,000 were boys and 201,000 were girls. It also noted that the ILO–IPEC regional programme to eliminate child labour in cocoa plantations in West Africa (WACAP) had resulted in the identification of over 5,000 children and the integration of around 1,300 children.

The Committee notes the comment by the CGTL that the national plan to combat child labour has never been formally adopted. The Committee notes the information from the Government that inter-ministerial consultations are being held to update and finalize the national plan to combat child labour. Furthermore, the Committee notes that an ILO–IPEC action programme entitled “Survey and development of a database on child labour” began in March 2007. According to the summary of this programme, the premature entry of children into the labour market remains a worrying phenomenon in Cameroon because of, among other reasons, the conditions of poverty of its population. For example, a basic survey on child labour in commercial agriculture was conducted in 2004 in the major cocoa-producing areas, particularly among children below the age of 18 working on cocoa farms. The study reveals that 30 per cent of children below the age of 14 in Cameroon are involved in cocoa production activities. However, the summary of the ILO–IPEC programme indicates that there is a lack of statistical data on the problem of child labour in Cameroon and that most statistical sources were not designed to deal specifically with this issue. As a result, the Government, through the National Institute of Statistics (INS), conducted a modular survey on child labour in 2007 with a view to carrying out a more in-depth and nationwide survey. The ILO–IPEC programme also aims subsequently to build national capacity to conduct surveys on child labour at regular intervals. The Committee once again expresses its concern at the situation of children under 14 years of age who are compelled to work in Cameroon, particularly in cocoa-production activities, and requests the Government to step up efforts to improve this situation. Taking into account the information on the extent of child labour in Cameroon, the Committee firmly hopes that the Government will adopt the national plan to combat child labour in the near future and requests it to provide information on the progress made in this regard. It also requests the Government to provide the statistics gathered following the survey conducted in 2007 within the framework of the ILO–IPEC programme on the development of a database on child labour in Cameroon.

Article 2, paragraph 1. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to ILO statistical data on Cameroon for the year 2000, a high number of children under 14 years of age were economically active in one way or another. The Committee therefore asked the Government to envisage adopting measures to establish provisions determining what constitutes light work, in accordance with Article 7, paragraphs 1 and 4, of the Convention. The Committee notes the information from the Government that there are no exemptions to the minimum age of 14 years for admission to work for light work in accordance with Article 7 of the Convention and that this minimum age remains without exclusions. The Committee notes, however, that, according to the statistics provided by UNICEF for the years 2000–06, 31 per cent of children aged between 5 and 14 years in Cameroon were working, indicating that the number of children working under the age of 14 remains high. Consequently, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that no children under 14 years of age are admitted to work or employment.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that the minimum age for admission to employment was set at 14 years because this age corresponds to the end of the period of compulsory schooling in Cameroon. However, the Committee noted that, according to information provided by UNESCO, the age of entry into primary school is 6 years, but the leaving age varies between 11 and 14 years. Furthermore, it noted that Act. No. 98/004 of 14 April 1998 establishing the framework for education in Cameroon does not specify the age of completion of compulsory schooling. In light of this, the Committee noted that children under the age of 14, who are therefore younger than the minimum age for admission to employment or work, may not actually be attending school.

The Committee notes that, in its comments, the CGTL indicates that there are no legal or regulatory provisions establishing the age of compulsory schooling. The Committee also notes that, according to the 2006 Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey conducted by the INS in collaboration with UNICEF, around 44 per cent of children of the legal age for entry into the first year of primary school, i.e. 6 years, are actually enrolled in school. Furthermore, the survey reveals that the net primary school attendance rate is 64 per cent for 6 year olds and that it gradually increases with age to reach 90 per cent for 11 year olds. Furthermore, 35 per cent of children of secondary school age are still in primary school. The Committee also notes that only 38 per cent of children aged between 12 and 18 are enrolled in secondary or higher education. The Committee notes the Government's indication that information on school attendance and drop-out rates will be sent to the Office at a later stage. Noting that the Government does not indicate the age of completion of compulsory schooling and considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to set the age of completion of compulsory schooling at 14 years in the near future. The Committee also requests the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the operation of the education system, in particular by increasing school enrolment and attendance rates among children under 14 years of age at secondary level. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard. Finally, the Committee also requests the Government to provide additional information available to it on school attendance and drop-out rates as soon as possible.

Article 3, paragraph 2. Determination of types of hazardous employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Order No. 17 on child labour of 27 May 1969 contains a list of work prohibited to children under the age of 18. It noted that this Order was adopted over 30 years ago.

The Committee notes that the CGTL indicates in its comments that Order No. 17 was adopted after consultation with the only trade union at the time, prior to adoption of the Convention. The CGTL also indicates that no consultations have been held more recently with organizations of employers and workers to determine types of hazardous work. In this regard, the Committee once again draws the Government's attention to the provisions of paragraph 10(2) of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146), which requests governments to re-examine periodically and revise as necessary the list of types of employment or work referred to in Article 3 of the Convention, particularly in the light of advancing scientific and technical knowledge. The Committee observes that, under Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Convention, these types of employment or work shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. The Committee requests the Government to take measures to revise the list of work prohibited to children under the age of 18, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned.

Article 5. Limitation of the scope of application of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Government had initially limited the scope of application of the Convention to those branches of economic activity or types of enterprise contained in Article 5, paragraph 3, of the Convention, namely mining and quarrying; manufacturing; construction; electricity, gas and water; sanitary services; transport, storage and communication; and plantations and other agricultural undertakings mainly producing for commercial purposes, but excluding family and small-scale holdings producing for local consumption and not regularly employing hired workers. The Committee notes the information from the Government that work in the informal sector is within the remit of labour inspectors and that this sector is difficult to supervise. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to strengthen labour inspection in the informal sector. It once again requests it to provide information on the general situation with regard to the employment or work of children and young persons in those branches of activity which are excluded from the scope of the Convention, taking into account the fact that a substantial number of children work in the informal sector in the country.

Article 6. Apprenticeship and vocational training. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes that section 4 of Decree No. 69/DF/287 of 30 July 1969 on apprenticeship contracts provides that a person must be at least 14 years of age to be hired on an apprenticeship contract. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, under section 1(3) of Act No. 76/12 of 8 July 1976 organizing rapid vocational training, rapid vocational training centres are open to candidates over the age of 18. The Committee also notes the information from the Government that, before the adoption of any regulatory text, employers' and workers' organizations are consulted within the framework of the National Labour Advisory Committee.

The Committee takes note of the communication of 17 October 2008 from the General Confederation of Labour – Liberty of Cameroon (CGTL) and the Government's report.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Cameroon's legislation appeared not to contain provisions prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of children under 18 years of age for the production of pornography or pornographic performances. It noted that a Child Protection Code was to be enacted and would take account of child pornography. The Committee notes the information sent by the Government to the effect that it undertakes to send the abovementioned Code to the Office as soon as it is adopted. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Child Protection Code will prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child under 18 years of age for the production of pornography or pornographic performances. It asks the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the Code is adopted in the near future and to provide a copy of it as soon as it is adopted.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities. The Committee noted previously the Government statement that Act No. 2005/015 of 20 December 2005 to combat the trafficking of children applies to the use, procuring or offering of children under 18 years of age for illicit activities. The Committee notes that the Government indicates more particularly that section 2(d) of this Act covers the illicit activities about which the Committee has been expressing concern. The Committee notes that section 2(d) of the Act states that the exploitation of children “shall cover at least the exploitation and procuring of children or all other forms of sexual exploitation, the exploitation of children’s labour or forced services, slavery or practices similar to slavery, servitude or the removal of organs”. The Committee reminds the Government that, according to Article 3(c) of the Convention, the use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities is among the worst forms of child labour and so must be expressly prohibited by the national legislation. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to prohibit by law the use, procuring or offering of children under 18 years of age for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs or for begging.

Clause (d). Hazardous work. Self-employed workers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Labour Code does not apply to children under 18 years of age who are engaged in hazardous work outside a contractual employment relationship. The Committee notes the information sent by the Government in its report that the Ministry of Social Affairs has set up provincial monitoring brigades to combat the use of children in hazardous work including children who work outside a contractual employment relationship. The Committee notes that according to the CGTL, the provincial brigades do not work side by side with labour inspectors or workers’ organizations. The CGTL indicates that it plans to find out how the brigades operate. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide more detailed information on the operation of the provincial brigades, particularly in terms of the number of children who have been found working outside a contractual employment relationship.

Article 4, paragraphs 1 and 3. Determining hazardous types of work or employment and periodic review. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Order No. 17 on child labour, issued on 27 May 1969, provides for a list of jobs prohibited for children under 18 years of age.

The Committee notes that the CGTL states in its comments that Order No. 17 was issued following consultation with the only trade union that existed at the time, before the Convention was adopted. It further indicates that no more recent consultations have been organized with employers’ and workers’ organizations for the purpose of determining hazardous types of work.

The Committee observes that Order No. 17 was adopted more than 30 years ago. It draws the Government’s attention to Article 4, paragraph 3, of the Convention, which calls on the Government to examine and review periodically the list of the types of work or employment referred to in Article 3(d), of the Convention, in consultation with the employers’ and workers’ organizations concerned. The Committee requests the Government to take steps to review the list of jobs which are prohibited for children under 18 years of age after consultation of the employers’ and workers’ organizations concerned.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. (i) Monitoring system. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the synthesis reports on the ILO–IPEC subregional project to combat the trafficking of children in West and Central Africa (LUTRENA) issued in March and September 2006, show that a system for monitoring child trafficking has been set up in the country. It also noted that a vice squad has been established at BCN-Interpol in Yaoundé to combat the trafficking, exploitation and abuse of children.

The Committee notes that, according to the CGTL, no extracts have been produced from reports or documents pertaining to the operation of the vice squad. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that as well as the monitoring carried out by the vice squad, a number has been made available to encourage the public to report such abuse anonymously and that BCN-Interpol has set up a round-the-clock answering service to receive these calls. The Government further indicates that three contact officers are on permanent standby to carry out investigations. The Committee further notes that according to the report on the ILO–IPEC project “Combating the trafficking of children for the purpose of exploiting their labour by reinforcing the national legislation on trafficking and the relevant institutional capacity to secure effective application of the law”, which covers the period from 1 September 2006 to 28 February 2007, six vigilance committees were established with the aim of involving the communities in observation and surveillance work. Special training has been devised to build the capacity of the members of these committees. The Committee again asks the Government to provide information on the running of the vice squad, including extracts of reports or documents. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the number of child victims of trafficking who have been identified by the call-in system set up by BCN-Interpol and by the vigilance committees and who have been rehabilitated and integrated in society.

(ii) Police. The Committee notes from a document entitled “The role of the police in managing the trafficking, smuggling and domestic exploitation of children”, the Cameroon police has focused its work on prevention, punishment and rehabilitation so as to combat child trafficking effectively in accordance with the Act to combat child trafficking. To this end, in the area of prevention, the police is engaged in raising public awareness through the media and in the surveillance of public places and of borders. Its law enforcement work consists in making the victims safe and gaining their trust, reporting the offence and gathering evidence, tracking down the perpetrators and their accomplices and bringing them before the appropriate judicial body. In the rehabilitation phase the police assist, inter alia, in repatriating the victims, returning them to their families if the latter are not implicated in the trafficking or else handing them over to appropriate institutions with a view to their social integration. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of investigations conducted by the police and the number of offences reported under the Act to combat the trafficking of children.

2. System for monitoring child labour in plantations. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under the ILO–IPEC regional programme to combat hazardous work and the exploitation of child labour in cocoa plantations and commercial agriculture in West and Central Africa (WACAP), a child labour monitoring system has been established. The Committee notes from WACAP’s synthesis report No. 4 on the child labour monitoring system that the system requires the participation of all strata of society from community to government level and aims in particular: to raise public awareness of the problem of child labour; to identify child workers engaged in agriculture and cocoa plantations and determine the risks to which they are exposed; to refer the children thus identified to institutions providing social protection services; to ensure that the children are withdrawn from work or, in the case of those allowed to work, that they are not exposed to any occupational risks. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of children in cocoa plantations in Cameroon who have been identified by this monitoring system and withdrawn from work and subsequently referred to social protection institutions.

Article 6. Programmes of action. 1. National programme of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that a national action programme for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour was to be formulated. It noted that a National Steering Committee has been established to implement the ILO–IPEC programmes. It expressed the hope that in the course of its work the steering committee would formulate a national action plan to abolish the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes that in its comments the CGTL expresses the hope that the National Steering Committee will formulate a policy and a national action plan to combat child labour. The Committee observes in this connection the Government’s statement that it has taken note of the Committee’s recommendations. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take steps to ensure that a national action plan is drawn up for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour and requests the Government to provide information on progress made in this respect. Moreover, it requests the Government to provide information on the operation of the National Steering Committee and the work it has undertaken to abolish the worst forms of child labour.

2. National policy to combat the trafficking of children for the purpose of exploiting their labour. The Committee noted previously a study carried out by ILO–IPEC–LUTRENA in 2005 on the trafficking of children for the exploitation of their labour in Cameroon. It noted in particular that one of the study’s recommendations is that a national policy should be formulated to combat the trafficking of children for the exploitation of their labour. The Committee notes that the Government says nothing of this matter in its report. It further notes that Cameroon is no longer involved in the LUTRENA project. Consequently, the Committee urges the Government to take measures to ensure that a national policy to combat the trafficking of children for the purpose of exploiting their labour is adopted, and to provide information in this regard.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and removing them therefrom. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that a study carried out by ILO–IPEC–LUTRENA on the trafficking of children for the purpose of labour exploitation in Cameroon recommended improving knowledge and understanding of the phenomenon of trafficking, changing public attitudes and encouraging greater mobilization of the authorities, civil society, trade unions and families.

The Committee notes that Cameroon is no longer involved in the LUTRENA project. It notes, however, from the synthesis report on the ILO–IPEC project on combating the trafficking of children for the purpose of labour exploitation by reinforcing the national legislation against trafficking and the relevant institutional capacity for effective application of the law, covering the period from 1 September 2006 to 28 February 2007, four action programmes have been implemented, two for the reintegration of child victims of trafficking and two for training and awareness raising. In the context of these action programmes, 161 children have been identified either as victims or at risk of trafficking and have been enrolled in primary school or vocational training programmes. Furthermore, two workshops have been organized to raise awareness among the communities and traditional chiefs. In all, the action programmes have assisted some 246 children and provided 678 educational or other services. The Committee also notes from the information sent by the Government that brochures about child trafficking and the rights of children were produced for the African Children’s Day, held on 16 June 2007. The Government also states that Decree No. 2001/109/PM of 20 March 2001 on the organization and running of public institutions to support socially maladjusted children provides for the creation of reception and transit centres and accommodation centres. As more and more centres open, children who have fallen victim to trafficking and exploitation will have access to temporary psycho-social support with a view to rehabilitation and social integration on a durable basis.

In this connection, the Committee notes that in its comments, the CGTL asserts that so far no reception and transit centres and no accommodation centres, as provided for in Decree No. 2001/109/PM of 20 March 2001, have been, or are being, created.

The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to implement measures for the establishment of awareness-raising campaigns and to provide information of their impact on preventing the trafficking of children. Furthermore, since the LUTRENA project has been completed in Cameroon, it asks the Government to provide information on the effective and time-bound measures taken or envisaged to: (a) prevent children from falling victim to trafficking; (b) provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from this worst form of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration, in particular through the establishment of the reception, transit and accommodation centres provided for in Decree No. 2001/109/PM of 20 March 2001. The Government is also asked to report on the progress made and the results obtained in this respect.

2. Hazardous work and the exploitation of children's labour in cocoa plantations. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Cameroon was a participant in the WACAP project implemented under the ILO-IPEC regional programme, in which Côte d'Ivoire, Ghana, Guinea and Nigeria are also associated. The Committee notes from WACAP's synthesis report No. 3 on shared experiences (synthesis report No. 3) that, as a result the WACAP project, a total of 1,517 children have been withdrawn from, or prevented from engaging in, work on cocoa plantations in Cameroon, through the provision of education services (1,383) and other services (134). According to the same report, 55 communities have been affected by the WACAP project and 605 parents or guardians have directly benefited from it. The Committee notes that implementation of the WACAP project is now complete. However, according to synthesis report No. 3, in Cameroon the awareness-raising activities carried out under the WACAP project have prompted the Government to commit itself to combating this scourge. The synthesis report No. 3 also indicates that the States participating in the WACAP project have all identified measures to ensure follow-up of the work done during the project's implementation. Such measures include organizing seminars on child labour in cocoa plantations; ongoing involvement of communities in child labour issues using tools provided by the WACAP project; offering informal education opportunities to children withdrawn from labour in the cocoa plantations who are unready to enter the formal school system; consolidating and building on achievements resulting from the WACAP project. The Committee urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to ensure follow-up of the WACAP project and also to ensure that children are prevented from being employed in cocoa plantations and are actually withdrawn from such plantations. The Government is asked to provide information on measures taken in this respect.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. 1. Orphans and HIV/AIDS. The Committee noted previously that, according to statistics produced by the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS) in 2004 and 2006, some 240,000 children have been orphaned as a result of HIV/AIDS in Cameroon. It noted the information communicated by the Government in its report that it had taken a number of measures to prevent transmission of the virus. The Committee also noted that the Ministry of Social Affairs, the Ministry of Health and various non-governmental organizations had implemented a project involving more than 21,000 children orphaned by HIV/AIDS and other children vulnerable to the virus. The Committee notes, however, that according to the UNAIDS 2008 Report on the global AIDS epidemic, the number of children orphaned because of the virus appears to have increased to 300,000 in 2007. Considering that children orphaned by HIV/AIDS are at increased risk from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee requests the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that children orphaned by HIV/AIDS are prevented from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the results obtained.

2. Street children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the information sent by the Government to the effect that the Ministry of Social Affairs gives support to all non-governmental organizations working for prevention and for the rehabilitation and reintegration of street children who fall victim to violence and exploitation and provides them with assistance to facilitate the provision of care to these children. The Committee also noted that the Ministry of Social Affairs, in collaboration with the Belgian Red Cross, has set up centres for listening support, reception and social reintegration for street children in Yaoundé to enable them to return to their own families or be placed in foster families. The Committee further noted that in 2003 and 2004, more than 351 children were returned to their families. The Committee once again reminds the Government that street children are particularly exposed to the worst forms of child labour, and asks it to provide information on the number of children removed from the streets and rehabilitated as a result of the measures taken by the Ministry of Social Affairs.

Article 8. International cooperation. 1. Regional cooperation regarding the sale and trafficking of children. The Committee noted previously that a synthesis report on the LUTRENA project issued in March 2006 showed that the Governments of Nigeria and Cameroon were discussing the possibility of concluding a bilateral cooperation agreement. The Committee notes that no information has been sent on this matter, and again asks the Government to indicate in its next report whether this agreement has been concluded.

2. Poverty reduction. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Government had added education for children, especially girls, to its poverty reduction strategy paper (PRSP). It also noted the Government's statement that the projects established in the context of the PRSP contribute to combating poverty among parents and hence to decreasing the number of children who are economically exploited. The Committee notes the information sent by the Government to the effect that the PRSP is undergoing revision. It also notes that a decent work country programme (DWCP) for Cameroon is being prepared. Pointing out once again that poverty reduction programmes contribute to breaking the vicious circle of poverty, which is essential to the elimination of the worst forms of child labour, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken in the course of implementing the PRSP and also the DWCP, if any, to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, and particularly to reduce poverty effectively among children who are the victims of sale and trafficking and those engaged in hazardous work in the cocoa plantations.

Parts IV and V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes from synthesis report No. 2 of the WACAP project, which is on health and safety in the cocoa plantations, that the most hazardous of the jobs performed on Cameroon's cocoa plantations involve the use of pesticides, deforesting and the transport of heavy loads. The same report further indicates that the older they are, the more likely children are to use pesticides, 10 per cent of children aged 5–7 years are engaged in spraying pesticides in the cocoa plantations of Cameroon. The Committee further notes that an ILO–IPEC action programme entitled “Survey and development of a database on child labour” was launched in March 2007 under which the Government, through the National Statistics Institute (INS), conducted a module survey on child labour in 2007 with a view to carrying out a fuller survey nationwide. The ILO–IPEC programme aims ultimately to build the national capacity to carry out surveys on child labour at regular intervals. The Committee requests the Government to provide the statistics compiled as a result of the survey conducted in 2007 under the ILO–IPEC programme on the development of a database on child labour in Cameroon, particularly as regards the worst forms of child labour, including the sale and trafficking of children for the purpose of exploiting their labour and child labour in the cocoa plantations.

Central African Republic

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that the Ministry of National Defence is responsible for recruitment to the armed forces of the Central African Republic and that age limits are observed in such recruitment. However, it noted that, according to UNICEF, children are the victims of forced recruitment in the Central African Republic.

The Committee notes that the Secretary-General of the United Nations, in his report of 21 December 2007 on children and armed conflict (A/62/609-S/2007/757, paragraphs 29–32), refers to many cases of the recruitment of children by the rebel group Union des forces démocratiques pour le rassemblement (UFDR), which controls parts of the north-east of the country. During UFDR attacks on the positions of the armed forces of the Central African Republic (FACA) and the French army in Birao in March 2007, former students of the Birao secondary school were identified among the rebels. Many of the children between the ages of 12 and 17 years who participated in these attacks lost their lives. Furthermore, according to the report, a UNICEF mission in June 2007 confirmed that there were approximately 400 to 500 children associated with the rebel groups of the Armée pour la restauration de la République et la démocratie (APRD) and the Front démocratique du peuple centrafricain (FDPC), which were participating in operations in the north-western region. The APRD and the FDPC are increasingly resorting to the forced recruitment of children in their areas of influence. United Nations partners have also reported that between Batangafo and Bokamgaye many young girls are forcibly taken as wives for rebels.

The Committee observes that the forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict still occurs and that the situation in the country remains fragile. It notes in this respect that the national legislation does not appear to contain provisions prohibiting and penalizing the forced recruitment of young persons under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict. The Committee expresses deep concern at the current situation, particularly since the persistence of this worst form of child labour gives rise to other violations of the rights of the child, such as murder and sexual violence. It reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 3(a) of the Convention, forced or compulsory recruitment of young persons under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour, and that under Article 1 of the Convention, member States are under the obligation to take immediate and effective measures to secure the elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee requests the Government as a matter of urgency to adopt legislation prohibiting and penalizing the forced or compulsory recruitment of young persons under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict. It also requests the Government to take immediate and effective measures to bring an end to the practice of forced recruitment of young persons under 18 years of age by armed groups, particularly in the north-east and north-west of the country. With reference to the Security Council which, in resolution No. 1612 of 26 July 2005 recalls “The responsibilities of States to end impunity and to prosecute those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other egregious crimes perpetrated against children”, the Committee urges the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed on persons found guilty of using young persons under 18 years of age in armed conflict. It requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (b) and (c). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and to ensure their access to free basic education and, wherever possible and appropriate, vocational training. Child soldiers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to information from UNICEF, the Government, UFDR and UNICEF signed an agreement on 16 June 2007 to reintegrate children connected with armed groups in the north-east of the country. In this respect, it notes that, according to the report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations of 21 December 2007 on children and armed conflict (A/62/609-S/2007/757, paragraphs 29–32), in the context of an agreement signed on 16 June 2007, a first group of approximately 200 children were released. In April and May 2007, over 450 children associated with the UFDR, 75 per cent of whom were boys aged between 13 and 17 years, were demobilized. All these children have since been reintegrated into their families and communities. Some 10 per cent of the children were as young as 10 years old. According to the report, a last group of between 450 and 500 children are reported to have been released and to have returned to their communities since September 2007, although this information has not been verified. With regard to children associated with the APRD and FDPC rebel groups, which are both active in the north-western region, the report indicates that in March and June 2007 the APRD requested assistance from the United Nations country team to demobilize child soldiers. An informal dialogue has been commenced with the APRD to prevent the recruitment of children and to demobilize and reintegrate those that are in its ranks with a view to their reintegration into society. However, formal negotiations are hampered by the insecurity in the north-western region.

The Committee further notes that, according to the “UNICEF Humanitarian Action Report 2008”, the situation of children, particularly in the northern prefectures of the country, remains a matter of concern. The conflict has resulted in internal displacements, with over 610,000 women and children suffering from the conflict. The Committee also notes that UNICEF intends to improve access to basic education for 113,000 conflict-affected children, through an extensive back-to-school campaign across the country’s northern prefectures. UNICEF also intends to facilitate the reintegration of 1,000 child soldiers into their families and communities. The Committee notes the progress achieved in the country, particularly through the Government’s collaboration with UNICEF. However, it observes that the current situation of the country remains a cause of concern. The Committee therefore requests the Government to redouble its efforts and to continue its collaboration with UNICEF and other organizations with a view to improving the situation of child victims of forced recruitment who are used in armed conflict. It also hopes that the Government will negotiate an end to armed conflict so that all children used in armed conflict will be demobilized and reintegrated, particularly in the north-east and north-west of the country. The Committee further asks the Government to adopt time-bound measures to ensure that child soldiers removed from armed groups benefit from appropriate assistance for their rehabilitation and social integration, including their reintegration into the school system or into vocational training, as appropriate. It requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

China

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

Article 2, paragraph 3, of the Convention. 1. Compulsory schooling. The Committee had previously noted the allegation of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), that educational opportunities for many of China’s children remain poor, especially in the rural areas and with regard to female students and minorities, and in some cases continue to decline, leading to continued or increased motives for child employment. Most crucially, the Committee had noted that the law fails to guarantee the funding for compulsory education, thus forcing or allowing many schools, particularly those in the impoverished rural regions, to go on collecting tuition fees or charge various miscellaneous fees to their students in the name of voluntary donations.

The Committee notes the Government’s detailed information regarding the several educational measures that are being implemented. Firstly, the Government indicates that it has adopted a development strategy that focuses on compulsory education in rural areas by allocating more financial resources for that purpose: the total expenditures on education in China topped 2.43 trillion yuan in the past five years (2003–07), which represents an increase of 1.26 times over the previous five-year period. The Government also indicates that towards the end of 2005, the State Council fully incorporated rural compulsory education into the scope of guaranteed public finance. In November 2007, the State Council deepened this financial reform by making more funds available for rural compulsory schooling. The main measures taken include:

- (a) providing free textbooks to all rural students of compulsory school age;
- (b) giving more subsidies to boarding school students from poor rural families to support their daily lives;
- (c) guaranteeing more funds for rural schoolhouse maintenance and renovation, more particularly in favour of schools in very difficult areas.

Accordingly, in 2007, all rural students of compulsory school age were exempted from tuition fees and were granted free textbooks. Boarding students from poor rural families had access to subsistence subsidies. As a result, 150 million students and 7.8 million boarding school students from poor families benefited from these measures. The Committee also notes that, according to the China country case study of 2007, prepared for the UNESCO Education for All Global Monitoring Report of 2008 (China country case study), several policies and programmes have been adopted to promote good-quality schooling, including improving teaching and learning quality through the New National Curriculum Reform (2008/ED/EFA/MRT/PI/82, pages 18–19). Furthermore, the Government indicates that the Compulsory Education Law was amended in 2006 and calls for improved regulatory frameworks and financial support systems to promote a balanced development of free universal education. The law also clearly states that no miscellaneous fees should be charged. The Government indicates that the State Education Inspection and Supervision Group is in charge of monitoring the enforcement of the Compulsory Education Law and that, in this regard, state education inspectors were dispatched to more than 20 provinces.

The Committee notes the Government's information that, as a result of all these measures, recent years saw a rise in the level of universal education across the country. The Government indicates that, by the end of 2007, 25 provinces had fully achieved the nine-year universal compulsory education goal. Furthermore, in 2007, the net enrolment rate in primary schools reached 99.5 per cent, and the proportion of primary-school graduates continuing their studies onto junior middle school reached 99.4 per cent. The gross enrolment rate in junior middle school reached 99.4 per cent, the net enrolment rate being slightly lower. However, the Committee notes that, according to the China country case study, until recently, quality issues in education have not received proper recognition and well-structured inspection guidance on quality education is still in the early stages of development (2008/ED/EFA/MRT/PI/82, page 8). In this respect, the State Education Inspection Office consists of only 90 inspectors at the national level and some of them are retired officials and part-time inspectors.

The Committee is of the view that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour and welcomes the important measures that are being taken by the Government to this end. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to take measures in order to considerably strengthen the mechanisms to monitor the enforcement of the Compulsory Education Law, more particularly the State Education Inspection Office, to ensure free compulsory education to all children and to supervise the quality of the education in both urban and rural areas. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

2. Education for migrant children. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the ITUC's allegations that, according to the hukou system, or household registration, local governments only allocate their resources, such as education, to permanent residents. In other words, migrant workers' children, who travel with their parents to a city where they have no right to register as permanent residents, even if they were born in that city, are not allowed access to schooling provided by the local governments. The Committee had noted that since the mid-1990s, migrants have started to organize and run their own schools, but that there is no guarantee of the quality of teaching in these schools and they are not legitimate educational institutions.

The Committee notes the Government's information that it attaches great importance to the education of the children of migrant workers and that it has developed a variety of policy measures to ensure their equal access to compulsory education. In 2005, the Circular of the State Council on Further Reform of the Rural Compulsory Education Financing System was promulgated and explicitly provides that the policy in place for urban students would similarly apply to the children of migrant workers from rural areas. In March 2006, the State Council issued the document entitled, "Certain opinions on addressing issues concerning migrant workers", which aims to ensure equal access to compulsory schooling for the children of migrant workers and to offer specific policy measures, including incorporating the issue into local education plans and equal treatment of migrant students in terms of tuition and administration. The Government further indicates that, in June 2006, the Compulsory Education Law was revised to provide that, "Local governments shall provide equal access to compulsory education for the school-aged children living with their parents or guardians who are working or residing in places rather than their registered permanent residences". In this regard, all localities have established basic regimes to ensure access to equal compulsory education for migrant children. The Committee further notes the Government's information that it is revamping and expanding the existing public schools through multiple solutions, including encouraging public-funded primary and junior high schools to raise the proportion of admission for migrant children and investing in the expansion of existing public schools in the vicinity of migrant families to meet their needs for schooling. Moreover, localities in China have established the financial guarantee system, according to which educational outlays for schools are allocated by taking into consideration the number of migrant students involved. Finally, the Government indicates that it is making efforts to improve the quality of teaching for migrant children. Among others, a special task force was formed under the auspices of the Office of Migrant Workers of the State Council to take care of children of migrant workers left behind in rural areas. The task force carried out a massive amount of research and studies and has elaborated work initiatives to address the issue of the education of children of migrant workers, while the Ministry of Education contributed by accelerating the construction of boarding schools in rural areas. The Committee also notes the commentary of the All-China Federation of Trade Unions (ACFTU) contained in the Government's report, according to which, by the end of 2007, trade unions at various levels have cumulatively raised 2.41 billion yuan for education aid funds, which were used to financially support the schooling of 2,894 million students from poor families.

While taking note of this information, the Committee expresses its deep concern at the important number of children of migrant workers who are left behind by parents in the countryside. Indeed, according to the All-China Women's Federation's in-depth study of 2007, based on the 2005 bi-census, it is estimated that there are about 58 million children below 18 years of age left behind by parents in the countryside, accounting for 21 per cent of all children in China and 28 per cent of all rural children. The study also found that more than 40 million left-behind children are under 15 years of age and that more than 30 million are aged between 6 and 15 years, making them vulnerable to becoming engaged in labour. Consequently, the Committee urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that the children of migrant workers receive free basic education. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of children of migrant workers who were effectively provided with compulsory education and prevented from child labour as a result of the several measures implemented by the Government.

Article 3, paragraph 1. Hazardous work. The Committee had previously noted the situation of schoolchildren performing manual work at schools, including having to produce firecrackers to compensate for the shortage of funds for their schooling. It had noted the ITUC's allegations that it is both the nature of the work – explosives used – and the nature of production – unsafe buildings, clusters of workshops and low fire safety measures – that make firework production an extremely dangerous occupation. The Committee had noted that, on 30 June 2006, several ministries, including the Ministry of Education, issued the “Regulations on the Management of Safety in Middle Schools, Primary Schools and Kindergartens” (MEO23), which provide that schools are not allowed to organize pupils to take part in, or to rent school premises to hire other persons for the fabrication of, notably, hazardous activities such as fabricating fireworks or toxic chemicals.

The Committee notes the Government's information that, since the promulgation of MEO23, all the persons responsible for accidents of various types were subject to severe sanctions and, in serious cases, to criminal sanctions in accordance with the regulations. The Government also indicates that, in recent years, educational departments and schools, in close collaboration with departments of public security, safety supervision and health, have made efforts pursuant to the safety and security policies in place to promote safety in primary and middle schools as well as kindergartens. As a result, the number of safety-related accidents and casualties in schools and kindergartens has dropped significantly. The Government indicates that, according to the data submitted by localities, the death toll caused by various types of accidents involving pre-school, primary and secondary school students in 2006 and 2007 has declined by 9.24 per cent and 13.67 per cent respectively from the previous years. Furthermore, the Committee notes the Government's information that, since 2006, no child or young person under the age of 18 engaged in dangerous work in schools, such as in the fabrication of fireworks, was found. However, the Government indicates that the Ministry of Education does not possess statistical information on the cases of infringements of the MEO23 and the penal sanctions applied.

The Committee takes due note of this information. It requests the Government to pursue its efforts to strictly enforce the prohibition of hazardous work contained in the MEO23 in order to ensure that children and young persons under 18 years of age are not engaged in hazardous work inside schools, even where safety and security measures are in place. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the number and nature of infringements of the MEO23 detected by the competent ministry, as well as the penalties applied on persons responsible for accidents involving school children performing hazardous activities, such as firework production, in schools.

Parts III and V of the report form. Labour inspectorate and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the ITUC's allegations that the vast majority of Chinese factories and enterprises do not employ children. However, the ITUC indicated that some employers have sought child labour as the solution to reducing production overheads, although the extent of child labour remains difficult to assess, due to a lack of official reporting on cases and the lack of transparency in statistics. The ITUC indicated that child workers can make up some 20 per cent of the workforce in certain industries, such as the firework industry, brick kilns and glass-making factories and the toy production industry. The Committee had noted that, in 2005, on the basis of an extensive promotion of “Provisions on Labour Security Inspection”, various localities strengthened the work of labour security inspection and enforcement in a comprehensive way, efforts were focused on combating the illegal use of child labour and specific examinations on the implementation of the Regulations Banning Child Labour of 2002 were conducted.

However, the Committee notes the comments of the ACFTU contained in the Government's report that a handful of child labour cases still exist in China. In this regard, the ACFTU urges the Government to make more efforts with regard to law enforcement supervision. Moreover, the Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of 24 November 2005, the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern about the limited public accessibility to reliable and comprehensive statistical data in China and recommended that the State party further strengthen its efforts to collect reliable and comprehensive statistical data (CRC/C/CHN/CO/2, paragraphs 22–23).

The Committee notes the Government's information that the issue of child labour is dealt with through the investigation of complaints, routine inspections, in-focus operations and annual labour inspection schemes. Since 2006, special campaigns were launched nationwide to supervise the status of labour law enforcement and crack down on illegal employment activities. Furthermore, a comprehensive administrative mechanism on the prohibition of child labour was established jointly by the Ministry of Human Resources and Social Security, Ministry of Public Security, Ministry of Education, the ACFTU, the Central Committee of the Communist Youth League of China and the All-China Women's Federation. The Committee also notes the Government's information that a labour supervisory framework, consisting of three-tiered organizations at the provincial, municipal and county levels, has been established. By the end of 2007, this labour supervisory framework consisted of 3,271 organs of labour security and inspection and employed 22,000 full-time labour inspectors. In addition, 28,000 inspectors from the regular system of security inspection were designated as part-time or concurrent labour inspectors in the labour supervisory framework. Furthermore, the Government indicates that, in 2008, the Ministry of Human Resources and Social Security established a specialized Labour Inspection Bureau to provide leadership over labour inspection across China. Finally, the Committee notes that, within the framework of the ILO Decent Work Country Programme 2006–10, it is intended to enhance child labour prevention by, notably, improving cooperation in monitoring and inspections with unions' participation. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of children who were found working through these various labour inspection mechanisms, as well as extracts from the reports of inspection services. It also asks the Government to provide information on the number and nature of the contraventions reported and penalties imposed.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It also notes the detailed discussions that took place at the 96th session of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007 concerning the application by China of Convention No. 182.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 240 of the Criminal Law of 1997 prohibits the abducting and trafficking of women and children. It had noted the allegations of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), that China is a source, transit and destination country for international human trafficking in women and children for sex exploitation and the entertainment industry. The Committee had noted with interest that the Government had taken a number of measures to combat trafficking, including major activities of cooperation with the ILO and public education campaigns in relation to some typical cases involving trafficking. It had also noted that two projects were implemented: the ILO–IPEC “Preventing trafficking in girls and young women for labour exploitation within China” project (CP-TING project), in collaboration with the All-China Women's Federation (ACWF), and the “Mekong Sub-regional Project to Combat Trafficking in Children and Women”, in which the Ministry of Public Security (MPS) took an active part.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that China continues to improve its policies and regulations concerning trafficking in women and children. First and foremost, it notes that, on 14 December 2007, the State Council approved a new National Plan of Action against Trafficking in Women and Children. The National Plan acknowledges the need to address all aspects of trafficking (policy, prevention, prosecution and protection) and signals a conceptual shift from “combating trafficking” to “anti-trafficking”. The Committee further notes that, according to the technical progress report of December 2007 for the CP-TING project, the MPS set up an anti-trafficking office at the beginning of July 2007 in order to promote legislative work and strengthen the combating of all kinds of trafficking. According to that technical report, the direct assistance provided in the framework of the CP-TING project benefited, among others, 250 migrant girls who had dropped out of school or were about to drop out and who were helped to continue their education; 10,000 migrant girls and young women who just arrived in target cities and received information on trafficking prevention; and 107,000 girls through awareness-raising activities. Furthermore, a National Anti-Trafficking Children's Forum hosted by the ACWF was held in Beijing in coordination with the ILO in which more than 20,000 children participated. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that public security organs have further enhanced efforts in building an anti-trafficking mechanism by elaborating the “Working Regulations for Public Security Organs on Combating the Abduction and Trafficking of Women and Children”, which specifies the roles and functions of various departments of public security and police forces and standardizes the procedures of operation for prevention, intervention, investigation and repatriation in child trafficking cases.

The Committee takes due note of this information. However, the Committee notes that, in the technical report for the CP-TING project, it is indicated that at the National Anti-Trafficking Children's Forum, Yin Jianzhong, an anti-trafficking official from the Investigative Bureau of the MPS stated that, at present, the phenomenon of trafficking for the purposes of forced physical labour and prostitution is worsening. Indeed, according to the Worker members at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, recent internal migration in China was the largest in human history. In 2005, there were 140 million migrants, with 40 million in the Guangdong province alone. The Committee therefore requests the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that children under 18 years are prevented from being engaged in trafficking for labour and sexual exploitation. It requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the National Plan in this regard, and the results achieved.

2. Forced labour. The Committee had previously observed that China's prison system comprises Laogai camps (reform through labour) and Laojiao (re-education through labour and juvenile criminal camps). The Committee had noted that the records indicate that all prisoners, including persons under 18, are subject to hard labour. It had noted the ITUC's allegations that, although Chinese criminal law calls for separate places for minors, in practice, due to limited spaces available, many minors are incarcerated with the adult population. The ITUC indicated that China has several procedures inside the criminal justice system which deal with minors. Pursuant to these procedures, children may be sent to special “work-study” schools, or to labour camp re-education programmes, through “custody and education” schemes.

(i) Forced labour at “work-study” schools

The Committee had noted that the ITUC indicated that the work-study schools are designed to reform children through work and study. Notwithstanding that the system forms a part of the compulsory nine years of education, this model has also become the basis of a form of school-run factories under the programme of “Diligent Work and Economical Study” (qingong jianxue) which allows for the exploitation of child labour. The Committee had also noted that, in its concluding observations of 13 May 2005, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights considered that the “Diligent Work and Economical Study” programme constitutes exploitative child labour, in contradiction with the provisions of Convention No. 182 (E/C.12/1/Add.107, paragraph 23).

(ii) Forced labour in re-education through labour camps – “custody and education”

The Committee had also noted the ITUC’s allegation that children between 13 and 16 years can be sent to custody and re-education programmes by the local public security bureaux without recourse to the criminal justice system. The ITUC also stated that children working in re-education through labour camps have little safeguards against overwork and poor conditions. Moreover, the Committee had noted that, in its concluding observations of 13 May 2005, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights stated that it was gravely concerned about the use of forced labour as a corrective measure, without charge, trial, or review, under the “Re-education through labour” (laodong jiaoyang) programme (E/C.12/1/Add.107, paragraph 22).

(iii) Forced labour through school-related or contracted work programmes

The Committee had further noted that the ITUC referred to the phenomenon of many schools which force children to work in order to make up school budgets. Under the work study programmes, pupils are obliged to work to “learn a skill”, but often they are put to perform regular work in labour intensive unskilled positions for longer periods of time where they do not learn any skill. In parts of the country, children are found to be working, during school hours, in assembling fireworks, beadwork, or other cottage industry-type production, as well as harvesting the yearly cotton harvest. Teachers and children reported that they were pressured to meet daily quotas and face possible fines if they fail to meet them.

The Committee notes that, at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, the Worker and Employer members expressed deep concern at the phenomena of re-education through labour and school-run factories operated in work-study schools where children are sent and detained without due process. More specifically, the Worker members recalled that, in fact, local security bureaux send children aged 13 to 16 to custody and re-education programmes without recourse to the criminal justice system. The Worker members further expressed their concern about the system in which schoolchildren are forced to work to make up school budgets, including factory and agricultural work with arduous long hours of picking cotton, quotas to be filled and fines for missed targets. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards emphasized the seriousness of such violations of Convention No. 182 and urged the Government to take measures, as a matter of urgency, to ensure that children are not subjected to forced labour in any situation and to provide information on developments in this respect in its next report to the Committee of Experts.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that, under China’s Prison Law, juvenile delinquent rehabilitation institutions are established for young delinquents under the age of 18 who meet the conditions of re-education through labour. Since 2006, the juvenile rehabilitation institutions strengthened their efforts in education by increasingly conducting teaching in classroom format, enhancing training in vocational skills and emphasizing supervision of law enforcement. The Government indicates that under the relevant legislation, such as the Criminal Law, Prison Law and Law on the protection of minors, any form of forced labour involving juvenile delinquents is banned. To give effect to the provisions of the Prison Law, the Ministry of Justice promulgated the Regulations on the administration of juvenile delinquent rehabilitation institutions, according to which children under the age of 16 are afforded special protection and are exempted from participation in productive labour. The Government indicates that juvenile delinquents follow work-study programmes to learn skills which are low in labour intensity, such as flower arrangement and embroidery. In 2007, the Ministry of Justice issued the Platform on re-education and reform of prisoners, section 26 of which provides that “Labour for juvenile delinquents shall focus primarily on study of knowledge and acquisition of skills; the duration of labour shall not exceed four hours per day or 20 hours per week.” The Committee also notes the Government’s information that the Provisional Rules of the State Council on work-study programmes for middle and primary schools prohibit hard work and heavy labour for middle and primary school students in the work-study process. The Government adds that the types of work performed by the students are all within their capacities and primarily centre around social work and community services.

While taking note of this information, the Committee shares the concern expressed by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards about the situation of children under 18 performing forced labour either in work-study programmes, as part of re-educational and reformative measures or through school-related programmes. This concern is further reinforced by the fact that the Regulations on the administration of juvenile delinquent rehabilitation institutions only exempt children under 16 years of age from productive labour. The Committee reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(a) of the Convention, forced labour is considered to be a worst form of child labour in which children under 18 years of age may not be engaged. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that children under 18 years of age are not forced to work, whether in the framework of re-educational or reformative measures or at school, or in any other situation, and to provide information on the progress made in this regard. The Committee also urges the Government to take measures to ensure that the Regulations on the administration of juvenile delinquent rehabilitation institutions exempt children between 16 and 18 years from productive labour.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. Labour inspectorate. The Committee had previously noted that the labour inspectorate is responsible for monitoring the implementation of the provisions concerning child labour. It had noted the ITUC's allegations that children are reportedly employed in some hazardous types of work, such as the firework industry, brick kilns and glass-making industries. The ITUC had observed that, given the shortage of labour inspectors, the chances of discovering children illegally working were slim. Therefore, although China does possess national legislation banning child labour and its worst forms, there remains a serious gap between legislation and implementation and monitoring. The Committee had noted the comments of the All-China Federation of Trade Unions (ACFTU) that the present system of laws and regulations on the prohibition of the use of child labour is sound and complete, but that the illegal use of child labour still exists.

The Committee notes that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards welcomed the expanded authority of the labour inspectorate in enforcing the law. However, the Worker members noted that the labour inspectorate required increased capacity and access to all workplaces, including the informal economy, where trafficked children are more likely to work.

The Committee notes the Government's information that a labour supervisory framework, consisting of three-tiered organizations at the provincial, municipal and county levels, has been established. By the end of 2007, this labour supervisory framework consisted of 3,271 organs of labour security and inspection and employed 22,000 full-time labour inspectors. In addition, 28,000 inspectors from the regular system of security inspection were designated as part-time or concurrent labour inspectors in the labour supervisory framework. Furthermore, the Government indicates that, in 2008, the Ministry of Human Resources and Social Security established a specialized Labour Inspection Bureau to provide leadership over labour inspection across China. The Government indicates that the departments of labour inspection have worked hard to fulfil their duties, including:

- (a) supervising the recruitment activities of employers in a more vigorous manner;
- (b) regularly checking for child labour by means of routine or ad hoc inspections, written requests, in-focus examinations, investigation of complaints and verification of cases reported by informants;
- (c) raising awareness about labour legislation and rules in order to improve law enforcement.

The Government indicates that, in June 2007, the case of the illegal employment of children in brick factories in Shanxi was exposed. The competent authority in Shanxi carried out province-wide investigations in enterprises: more than 86,000 employers were subject to inspections, involving 1.92 million employees. As a result, 13 illicit brick yards without business licenses were found exploiting 15 child labourers in violation of the law. The perpetrators were prosecuted and eight of them were sentenced to prison terms ranging from one to three years. The Committee finally notes the Government's information that it is studying and elaborating an integrated mechanism to further improve the monitoring of labour regulations and employment practices in the rural areas of China. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue to strengthen the capacity and reach of the labour inspectorate. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on progress made in the elaboration of the integrated mechanism to improve monitoring in the rural areas of China. It also requests the Government to supply, with its next report, extracts of the inspection reports specifying the extent and nature of violations detected involving children and young persons engaged in the worst forms of child labour, both in the formal and the informal sectors.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Penalties. 1. Trafficking. The Committee had previously noted that the Criminal Law provides for sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties for the violation of the provisions prohibiting the sale and trafficking of children (section 240). It had noted the ITUC's allegation that despite strong efforts by the Chinese authorities to stem the problem in areas severely affected by trafficking in women and children, grass roots authorities have generally failed to take effective action. For the ITUC, the problem lies primarily in the implementation of the law and not in the legislation itself. The Committee had noted the statistics provided by the Government on the number of prosecutions in cases of trafficking in children in the years 2004–06 which, according to the Government has sent shockwaves through the criminal elements trafficking women and children.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that, from June 2006 through June 2008, the Office of the Public Prosecutor prosecuted several criminal cases and suspects of trafficking in children: 2,173 persons in 988 cases were prosecuted for abducting and trafficking children; 53 persons in 12 cases were prosecuted for buying abducted children; 401 persons in 277 cases were prosecuted for abducting children; and one person was prosecuted for assembling a crowd to impede the rescue of bought women and children. During the same period, Chinese courts have sentenced 4,289 criminals for these crimes: 314 criminals were sentenced for abducting children.

However, the Committee notes that, at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, the Worker members indicated that, with such rapid economic and demographic change in China, the trafficking challenge has grown and that law enforcement, particularly concerning trafficking, requires effective inter-agency cooperation between the various public authorities. In this regard, while reports indicated political will in central government in tackling trafficking, evidence reflected a lack of enforcement at the local level. The Worker members also expressed deep concern at reports of poor local enforcement and collusion between local authorities, the police and bar and nightclub owners in the recruitment of Tibetan sex workers. The Committee urges the Government to continue to take measures to ensure that persons engaged in the trafficking of children for labour and sexual exploitation are prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed, at the local level. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard and to continue providing information on the number of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied.

2. Forced labour. The Committee had previously noted that, according to section 244 of the Criminal Law, the persons who are directly responsible for the offence of forced labour shall be sentenced to fixed-term imprisonment of not more than three years or criminal detention and shall also, or shall only, be fined. It had noted that, according to this provision, a person committing the offence of forced labour, may be sentenced to a fine only. The Committee had considered that the penalties provided for in section 244 of the Criminal Law for the offence of forced labour are not sufficiently dissuasive to the extent that the penalty applied may merely consist of a fine. It had reminded the Government that, by virtue of Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention, the Government shall take the necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including the provision and application of the penal sanction of imprisonment. The Committee notes with regret the lack of information in the Government's report on this point. It urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the application of the penalty of imprisonment for an offence as serious as one involving forced labour, to ensure that persons who force children under 18 years of age to work are prosecuted and that effective and dissuasive penalties are applied, as a matter of urgency.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. Beggars and homeless children. The Committee had previously noted the ITUC's allegation that, from August 2003 through the end of June 2004, police picked up 80,000 child beggars nationwide, but that the number of child beggars may be much higher. It had noted that the village of Gongxiao has had professional beggars for decades, but began to use disabled children as a means of producing a greater return. The Committee had noted the Government's information that the "Opinions on strengthening the work on adolescent vagrants", jointly issued by 18 departments, spells out the duties of various departments and organs in combating the phenomenon of child begging and protecting and rehabilitating homeless or begging minors.

The Committee notes the Government's information on the several measures it has taken to protect children from begging. Among other things, the Government indicates that relief and protection institutions all over the country pay much attention to protecting the rights and safety of minors in difficult situations, including vagrant children, by providing daily life care, education, skill development, employment assistance, psychological counselling and behaviour correction. There are presently 1,351 relief stations and 152 relief and protection centres for homeless children in China. Since 2003, the cumulative number of child vagrants relieved has amounted to 588,000. The Committee further notes that, in November 2006, the MPS issued the "Work Programme on Special Operations against Crimes of Forcing and Alluring Minors into Vagrancy and Begging as well as Crimes of Forcing and Abducting Deaf and Dumb Youth for Illegal Activities", which was implemented by police organs all over the country during the period of late December 2006 to August 2007. In the framework of these operations, where police forces consisted of 260,000 persons, some 110,000 places in key regions were raided, 3,600 cases of various types were investigated, more than 5,000 criminals were arrested and over 8,000 minors were rescued. The Government also indicates that section 17 of the amendments to the Criminal Law of 29 June 2006 provides for a new clause in the Criminal Law which prohibits any person from organizing, by means of violence and coercion, disabled persons or minors under 14 years of age, to beg.

The Committee takes note of this information. However, it observes, like the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, that large numbers of child beggars still exist and requests the Government to continue its efforts to protect homeless children and child beggars from the worst forms of child labour and to provide for their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the progress made in this regard, and the results achieved.

Article 8. International cooperation. Trafficking. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's information that, since 2006, under Phase II of the ILO-IPEC project "Reducing labour exploitation of children and women: Combating trafficking in the Greater Mekong Sub-region", Chinese trainees have actively participated in the anti-trafficking programme in a school of Khon Kaen, Thailand. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that China has enhanced cooperation in international anti-trafficking programmes and has vigorously promoted international anti-trafficking judicial and police collaboration. Furthermore, in December 2007, the MPS, in collaboration with the Office of Women and Children Affairs Committee of the State Council, Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Ministry of Commerce, successfully organized the second Ministerial Consultation and fifth Senior Official Meeting of the Mekong Subregion on combating abducting and trafficking in women and children. The conference culminated in the Joint Declaration of the "Mekong Sub-regional Cooperation in the Anti-trafficking Process", by ministers from the countries of China, Cambodia, Laos, Myanmar, Vietnam and Thailand. The Government also indicates that, to cope with rising crimes in transnational human trafficking at the border areas, the public security organs in China have strengthened law enforcement cooperation with neighbouring countries, resulting in substantial achievements. Joint special operations against abduction and trafficking were carried out in 2006, during which 13 criminal gangs were disbanded, 73 cases of trafficking of foreign women and children were solved, 95 suspects were arrested (47 of foreign nationality) and 193 abducted foreign women and children were rescued. Moreover, three liaison offices were established along the China-Vietnam border area and one along the China-Myanmar border area, which facilitated cooperation in the exchange of information, repatriation of victims and transfer of suspects. The Committee further notes that China formally launched the China-Myanmar Anti-trafficking Cooperation Programme (2007–10), building on the continued China-Vietnam Anti-trafficking Cooperation Programme. The Committee notes that, at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, the Worker members, given the commitment they heard from the Government, urged it to study and ratify the Protocol to prevent, suppress and punish trafficking in persons, especially women and children (the Palermo Protocol) and to examine the new European Convention on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings, which stresses the rights of victims. The Committee accordingly encourages the Government to consider ratifying the Palermo Protocol and to examine the European Convention against Trafficking in Human Beings. It also requests the Government to continue providing information on the impact of international and regional anti-trafficking agreements and programmes, and of cooperation in law enforcement, in combating the trafficking of children, and the results achieved.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Colombia

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2005)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. The Committee notes that section 13 of Act No. 418 of 1997, as amended by section 2 of Act No. 548 of 1999, prohibits the enlistment of minors under 18 years of age into the armed forces. However, it notes that no penalties are laid down for violations of this prohibition. It also notes that, under section 14 of Act No. 418 of 1997, anyone who recruits minors under 18 years of age with a view to incorporating them into insurgent or self-defence groups, encourages them or allows them to join these groups or, to that end, provides them with military training, shall be liable to prosecution.

The Committee notes that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General on children and armed conflict of 21 December 2007 (A/62/609-S/2007/757, paragraphs 113–120), the Government of Colombia, through the Colombian Family Welfare Institute (ICBF), has made efforts to prevent the recruitment of children and, where applicable, reintegrate them into their communities. However, according to the report, the Colombian Revolutionary Armed Forces (FARC) continue to recruit and use children. Cases have been reported in the departments of Cauca, Antioquia, Sucre, Bolivar, Cundinamarca, Guaviare, Meta and Nariño. In Corinto in the department of Cauca, members of the FARC frequently visit schools to persuade children to join their ranks. Furthermore, the National Liberation Army (ELN) continues to recruit children, even though it is currently in talks with the Government and the National Council for Peace has asked it to cease this practice and immediately release all children from its ranks.

The Committee also notes that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General, children have been used by government armed forces for intelligence purposes despite official government policy to the contrary. On 6 March 2007, the Colombian Ministry of Defence issued Directive No. 30743, prohibiting all members of the armed forces from using children for intelligence activities, especially children recovered from illegal armed groups. However, the Ombudsman's Office (Defensoría del Pueblo) reported that in Cauca a child demobilized from the FARC was used by the XXIXth Brigade as an informant for the armed forces in a military operation. Children have reportedly been forced by the national army to carry equipment for them. Moreover, armed forces operating in certain regions are said to have children with food in exchange for cleaning and maintaining their weapons. The Ombudsman's Office continues to report children being held for unauthorized periods in police stations, army battalions or judicial police premises.

The report also refers to violations and abuses committed against children by new organized illegal armed groups. These groups, such as the Aguilas Negras, Manos Negras, Organización Nueva Generación or the Rastrojos, are extensively involved in criminal activities related especially to drug trafficking. In June 2007, the Aguilas Negras were reported to have forced children to join their ranks in Cartagena in the department of Bolivar. The other three groups mentioned above are also reported to have recruited and used children from Valle de Cauca, Bolivar (Cartagena) and Antioquia (Medellín).

Furthermore, the United Nations Secretary-General states in his report that the National Institute for Forensic Medicine certified that in the reporting period 37 children (13 girls and 24 boys) were killed and 34 children (four girls and 30 boys) were allegedly injured by government security forces. According to the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), nine cases have been filed with the judicial police. Extra-judicial executions by some members of the government security forces have also been reported. Children have also been abducted, killed or injured by illegal armed groups. From October 2006 to May 2007, approximately 43 children were reported to have been held hostage and others killed. Rape and other forms of sexual violence and exploitation by illegal armed groups and some members of the state forces are also said to be continuing.

The Committee also notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations on the third periodic report of Colombia of June 2006 (CRC/C/COL/CO/3, paragraphs 80 and 81), expressed its deep concern at the grave consequences of the internal armed conflict on children in Colombia, causing them serious physical and mental injury and denying them the enjoyment of their most basic rights. The CRC is concerned at: (a) the large-scale recruitment of children by illegal armed groups for combat purposes and also as sex slaves; (b) the use of children by the army for intelligence purposes; and (c) the general lack of adequate transparency in consideration of aspects relating to children in the negotiations with illegal armed groups, resulting in ongoing impunity for those responsible for the recruitment of child soldiers. In order to improve the situation of children affected by the internal armed conflict, the CRC made various recommendations to the Government, including: (a) never to use children for military intelligence purposes, as this places them at the risk of reprisals from illegal armed groups; and (b) to take due account, in peace negotiations with illegal armed groups, that former child soldiers are victims and that the recruitment of children is a war crime for which these groups are accountable.

The Committee notes that, despite the measures taken by the Government and the prohibition on the forced or compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict laid down by the national legislation, children are still being forced to join illegal armed groups or the armed forces. It is deeply concerned at the persistence of this practice, especially as it leads to other violations of the rights of children, such as abduction, murder or sexual violence. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to take immediate and effective measures to put a stop in practice to the forced or compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict and proceed with the full and immediate demobilization of all children. With reference to Security Council resolution 1612 of 26 July 2005, which recalls “the responsibilities of States to end impunity and to prosecute those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other egregious crimes perpetrated against children”, the Committee urges the Government to ensure that investigations and prosecutions of offenders are undertaken and that effective and deterrent penalties are imposed on any person found guilty of recruiting or using children under 18 years of age for the purpose of armed conflict. It requests the Government to supply information in this regard.

Article 6. Programmes of action. The Committee notes the drawing up of the “National Strategy for preventing and eliminating the worst forms of child labour and protecting young workers (2008–15)”, involving various government bodies and employers’ and workers’ organizations. It also notes that the National Strategy aims to drastically reduce child labour between 2008 and 2015. National programmes and projects for the prevention and elimination of the worst forms of child labour will be formulated and implemented. They will be aimed at all young persons who are the victims of forced recruitment into the illegal armed groups. The objective will be to withdraw these children from this worst form of child labour and remove any risk of their returning to it by providing them with education and their families with social services. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the implementation of national programmes and projects for the prevention and elimination of the forced recruitment of children into illegal armed groups adopted under the “National Strategy for preventing and eliminating the worst forms of child labour and protecting young workers (2008–15)”, and on the results achieved.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour. Child soldiers. The Committee notes that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General on children and armed conflict of 21 December 2007 (A/62/609-S/2007/757, paragraphs 113 to 120), positive efforts have been made by the Government in the demobilization of combatants from the United Self-Defence Forces of Colombia (AUC). The report also states that 3,326 children previously associated with illegal armed groups have benefited, through the Colombian Family Welfare Institute, from the government initiative to prevent the recruitment of children by armed groups and reintegrate them into their communities.

The Committee also notes that the CRC, in its concluding observations of June 2006 (CRC/C/COL/CO/3, paragraphs 80 and 81), noted with satisfaction that educational kits have been distributed to schools in heavily affected conflict areas by the army, and that certain measures have been taken to improve the reintegration and rehabilitation of demobilized child soldiers. However, the CRC considers that a number of important measures for demobilized and captured child soldiers are still lacking and notes with concern that: (a) captured and demobilized child soldiers are subjected to interrogation and the armed forces do not comply with the 36-hour deadline established by law for handing them over to the civilian authorities; (b) children are used by the army for intelligence purposes; and (c) rehabilitation, social reintegration and compensation available for demobilized child soldiers are inadequate. The CRC made a number of recommendations to the Government, including that it should substantially increase the resources for rehabilitation, social reintegration and reparations available to demobilized child soldiers as well as for child victims of landmines.

The Committee notes that the Government has participated in the ILO–IPEC interregional programme on the prevention of child recruitment and the reintegration of children involved in armed conflict, which ended in 2007. According to the information available to the Office, more than 650 children have been prevented from becoming involved in the conflict and more than 560 have been removed from it. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts and take steps to remove children from armed conflict and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. In this regard, it requests the Government to supply information on the number of children under 18 years of age who have been rehabilitated and reintegrated into their communities as a result of these measures.

The Committee is also raising a number of other points in a direct request to the Government.

Congo

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2002)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or similar practices. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's statement that there is child trafficking between Benin and the Congo for the purpose of forcing children to work in Pointe-Noire in trading and domestic work. According to the Government, the children are forced to work all day in harsh conditions by their host families, and are subjected to all kinds of hardships. The Committee noted that sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code lay down penalties for anyone found guilty of the forcible or fraudulent abduction of persons including young persons under 18 years of age. It requested the Government to indicate to what extent sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code have been implemented in practice. The Committee requests the Government once again to supply information on the application of sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code in practice, including, in particular, statistics on the number and nature of offences reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous observations, the Committee noted the Government's statement acknowledging that the trafficking of children between Benin and the Congo for the purpose of forcing children to work in Pointe-Noire in trading and domestic work is contrary to human rights. It also noted that the Government has taken certain measures to curb child trafficking, including: (a) the repatriation by the Consulate of Benin of children who have either been picked up by the national police or removed from families; and (b) the requirement at borders (airport) for minors (young person under 18 years of age) to have administrative authorization to leave the territory of Benin. The Committee asked the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures taken with regard to the rehabilitation and social integration of children following their withdrawal from labour. It notes that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject. The Committee requests the Government once again to supply information on the time-bound measures taken to remove young persons under 18 years of age from this worst form of child labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It also requests the Government to supply information on the impact of these measures.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes that, according to the concluding observations of the Committee on the Rights of the Child on the initial report of the Congo of October 2006 (CRC/C/COG/CO/1, paragraph 85), a study of the root causes and repercussions of trafficking is due to be conducted in the country. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the results of this study and to supply a copy of it once it has been prepared.

The Committee is also raising a number of other matters in a direct request to the Government.

Costa Rica

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1976)

Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government stating that the Bill on the employment of young persons is currently being examined by a special committee of the Social Affairs Commission of the Legislative Assembly, and the Bill prohibiting the performance of hazardous and unhealthy types of work by young workers by the Legislative Assembly. The Committee firmly hopes that both these Bills will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this area.

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the statistics contained in the report on the results of the national study on work by children and young persons in Costa Rica, published in June 2003 by the National Statistical and Census Institute and the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, in collaboration with ILO-IPEC and the Statistical Information and Monitoring Programme on Child Labour (SIMPOC), according to which around 113,500 girls and boys between 5 and 17 years of age were working in Costa Rica. Of this number, around 49,200 children under 15 years of age were working. The Committee noted the Second National Action Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour and the special protection of young workers (2005–10). Finally, it noted that Costa Rica is participating in the ILO-IPEC project entitled: "Elimination of child labour in Latin-America".

The Committee notes the measures adopted by the Government to abolish child labour. It notes in particular that the Second National Action Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour and the special protection of young workers was reviewed and reformulated in 2007, so that it could be brought in line with the new government policies, especially the National Development Plan (2006–10). The Committee further notes that the National Childhood Foundation (PANI) has taken measures to implement the Second National Action Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour and the special protection of young workers. For instance, the PANI has introduced a programme of inter-institutional inspection for the protection of human rights and rights at work in priority sectors. The aims of this programme are to make children and young persons aware of the repercussions of work and to train labour inspectors specialized in child labour. The Committee takes note of the statistics provided by the Government according to which, in 2007, the labour inspection services of the Central Office of San José detected 97 cases involving children in the Central Region, in San José, Heredia and an area of Cartago. The children were working in the commercial, services, industrial, agricultural, construction and transport sectors. The Committee also notes that a household survey will be carried out in 2009 and that some questions will focus on the work of children and young persons.

The Committee notes that, according to the information in an ILO–IPEC report of June 2008 on the third stage of the project entitled: “Elimination of child labour in Latin-America” (ILO–IPEC report of June 2008), poverty has declined by 5 per cent in the country; in the specific case of young persons, poverty has declined by 3.9 per cent. What is more, the Committee takes due note that, according to this report, there has been a slight reduction in the number of young persons working. The Committee nevertheless observes that the child labour statistics provided by the Government only concern the Central Region of Costa Rica and do not give an overall view of the problem in the country. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures taken to abolish child labour, in the context of the Second National Action Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour and the special protection of young workers, the National Development Plan (2006–10) and the ILO–IPEC project on the elimination of child labour in Latin America. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress achieved. The Committee also invites the Government to continue providing information on the application of the Convention in practice by giving, for example, statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, extracts from reports of the inspection services, in particular inspections carried out in the sectors mentioned above. Finally, it asks the Government to provide the findings of the household survey that will be carried out in 2009.

Article 2, paragraph 1. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted a contradiction between, on the one hand, section 89 of the Labour Code, which established a minimum age for admission to employment of 12 years and, on the other, sections 78 and 92 of the Code of Children and Young Persons which set this minimum age at 15 years, in accordance with the minimum age specified when the Convention was ratified. The Government pointed out that, in the legal system in Costa Rica, the principle whereby the standard contained in a special law has priority over that contained in a general law applies. Furthermore, there is also the principle that the most favourable standard, providing optimum conditions, must be implemented. In the present case, therefore, the Code of Children and Young Persons has precedence over the Labour Code. While noting this information, the Committee observed that, in view of the child labour statistics involving children under 15 years of age in the country, the provisions of the Labour Code should be brought in line with those of the Code of Children and Young Persons. The Committee takes note of the Government’s indication that it undertakes to consider this matter when reviewing the labour legislation. The Committee expresses the hopes that, when undertaking a future revision of the labour legislation, the Government will take the necessary measures in this respect.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee notes that, according to UNICEF’s 2006 statistics, the primary school net attendance rate is 89 per cent among girls and 87 per cent among boys; at secondary school level, the rates are 65 per cent among girls and 59 per cent among boys. The Committee takes note of the information in the ILO–IPEC report of June 2008 on the project to eliminate child labour in Latin-America, which states that the programme “Let’s Advance Together” (Avancemos), setting out to ensure the lasting reintegration of young persons in the formal education system, has been implemented.

The Committee takes due note of the primary school net attendance rates. It nevertheless expresses its concern at the somewhat low net attendance rates at secondary school level. Believing that compulsory education is one of the most effective ways of combating child labour, the Committee strongly urges the Government to take measures to improve the functioning of the country’s education system. In this respect, it requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken, particularly in the context of the programme “Let’s Advance Together”, to increase the school net attendance rates, particularly at secondary school level, and to prevent children under 15 years of age from working. It further requests the Government to submit information on the progress achieved.

Côte d'Ivoire

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2003)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3(a) of the Convention. All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. Informal sector. In its comments under Convention No. 29, the Committee referred to allegations of the trafficking of children for economic exploitation and a widespread practice under which migrant workers, including children, particularly from Mali and Burkina Faso, are forced to work in plantations, particularly cocoa plantations, against their will.

The Committee noted that section 370 of the Penal Code provides that any person who, by means of fraud or violence, abducts minors from where they have been placed by those in authority or under whose direction they have been consigned shall be liable to sanctions. If the abducted minor is under 15 years of age, the maximum penalty is imposed. It also noted that under section 371 of the Penal Code, the abduction or attempted abduction of a young person under 18 years of age is an offence. However, this provision is not applicable in cases where the abducted minor marries the person responsible for the abduction, unless the marriage is annulled. The Committee noted that, in the absence of specific legislation prohibiting the trafficking of children, these two provisions of the Labour Code constitute legal tools to combat the trafficking of children in Côte d’Ivoire. However, it noted that, according to the study carried out by ILO–IPEC–LUTRENA in 2005 on the trafficking of children for their exploitation in work in the informal sector in Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire, these provisions are ill adapted to combating the trafficking of children for economic exploitation as they only cover cases of the abduction of minors, whereas the internal or transborder trafficking of children in Côte d'Ivoire is based on traditional networks for the placement of children and therefore occurs with the consent of the children's parents or guardians.

The Committee noted that, on 1 September 2000, the Governments of Côte d'Ivoire and Mali signed a bilateral cooperation agreement to combat the transborder trafficking of children. It also noted with interest that the Governments of Benin, Burkina Faso, Côte d'Ivoire, Guinea, Liberia, Mali, Niger, Nigeria and Togo, on 27 July 2005, signed a multilateral cooperation agreement to combat the trafficking of children in West Africa. Furthermore, Côte d'Ivoire is one of the nine West African countries, in addition to Benin, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Gabon, Ghana, Mali, Nigeria and Togo, which are participating in the Subregional Programme Combating the Trafficking in Children for Labour Exploitation in West and Central Africa (LUTRENA), which commenced in July 2001 with the collaboration of ILO-IPEC. One of the objectives of the LUTRENA programme is to strengthen national legislation to combat the trafficking of children with a view to the effective harmonization of legislation prohibiting trafficking. In this respect, the Committee noted that, according to the information available to the Office, a Bill on the trafficking of children was adopted by the Council of Ministers in 2001, but has still not been put to the vote by the National Assembly.

The Committee noted the efforts that have been made by Côte d'Ivoire for a number of years to combat the trafficking of children, but regretted that the Bill referred to above has not yet been put to the vote by the National Assembly. In practice, this weakness of the legal framework is one of the factors facilitating the economic exploitation of children. The Committee nevertheless noted that the strengthening of the legal framework relating to child labour, and particularly the sale and trafficking of children for economic exploitation, is one of the specific objectives of the National Plan of Action against Child Labour adopted by the Government in 2005. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures for the adoption of the Bill on the trafficking of children in the near future.

Article 3(d) and Article 4, paragraph 1. Hazardous work. Gold mines. The Committee noted that, according to the study carried out by ILO-IPEC-LUTRENA in 2005 on the trafficking of children for exploitation in gold mines in Issia, Côte d'Ivoire, children are the victims of internal and transborder trafficking for economic exploitation in the gold mines of Issia. The Committee noted that child labour in mines is one of the 20 hazardous types of work covered by section 1 of Order No. 2250 of 14 March 2005 and is prohibited for young persons under 18 years of age. The Committee also noted that, when this list of hazardous types of work was defined, the various ministries responsible for agriculture and forestry, mines, trade and services, transport and crafts, and the social partners, were consulted. It also noted that Côte d'Ivoire participates in the internal system for the certification of diamonds established by the Kimberley Process. The Committee reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 3(d) of the Convention, work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children, is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour and must be prohibited for persons under 18 years of age. Although the legislation is in conformity with the Convention on this point, child labour in mines is a problem in practice. The Committee therefore requests the Government to redouble its efforts to secure the effective application of the legislation on the protection of children against hazardous work, and particularly hazardous work in mines.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. National Steering Committee. The Committee noted that, according to information concerning the IPEC/LUTRENA programme, a National Steering Committee has been established and will monitor activities relating to child labour, and particularly the trafficking of children. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the activities of the National Steering Committee, for example by supplying extracts of reports or documents.

Article 6. Programmes of action. ILO-IPEC regional programme to combat child labour in cocoa plantations in Western and Central Africa (WACAP). The Committee noted that Côte d'Ivoire is participating in the ILO-IPEC regional programme to combat child labour in cocoa plantations in Western and Central Africa (WACAP), which also includes Cameroon, Ghana, Guinea and Nigeria. In this respect, the Committee noted that, according to information available to the Office, over 5,000 children have been removed from cocoa plantations in Côte d'Ivoire and have benefited from school attendance and training programmes. It also noted that around 1,100 children have been prevented from working in cocoa plantations. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of children who are, in practice, removed from cocoa plantations, and the measures taken for their rehabilitation and social integration. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of children who are prevented from being engaged in these plantations.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and assisting in the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour. The Committee noted that, according to information on the IPEC/LUTRENA project available to the Office, nearly 200 child victims of trafficking have been prevented from being the victims of trafficking or removed from this worst form of child labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the IPEC/LUTRENA project in Côte d'Ivoire, particularly in terms of the number of children prevented from being the victims of trafficking and the number of child victims removed from this worst form of child labour. It also requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken for the rehabilitation and social integration of these children.

Clause (c). Ensuring access to free basic education and vocational training for all children removed from the worst forms of child labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in the framework of the ILO-IPEC-LUTRENA project to ensure that child victims of trafficking who have been removed from this worst form of child labour have access to free basic education and vocational training.

Clause (e). Taking account of the special situation of girls. According to the information available to the Office, the measures taken by the Government to combat child labour and the worst forms of child labour do not properly take into account the special situation of girls. The Committee drew the Government's attention to the fact that over 50 per cent of the children concerned in the LUTRENA project are girls. It therefore requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in practice to take account of the situation of girls in the context of its action to combat the worst forms of child labour.

Article 8. International cooperation. The Committee noted that Côte d'Ivoire is a member of Interpol, the organization which assists in cooperation between countries in the various regions, particularly to combat the trafficking of children. It also noted that, in the context of the multilateral cooperation agreement to combat the trafficking of children in West Africa of 27 July 2005, the signatory States undertook to adopt measures to prevent the trafficking of children, mobilize the necessary resources to combat this practice, exchange detailed information on the victims and those responsible for violations, bring criminal charges and punish any action to facilitate the trafficking of children, develop specific programmes of action and establish a national monitoring and coordination committee. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to give effect to the multilateral agreement signed in 2005, particularly in cases where the exchange of information provides a basis for identifying child trafficking networks and arresting the persons working in such networks. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate whether measures have been taken to identify and intercept child victims of trafficking in border regions and whether transit centres have been established.

Parts IV and V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee noted the decisions handed down by courts in Côte d'Ivoire sentencing persons charged with the trafficking of children. It also noted that SIMPOC and LUTRENA have conducted a national survey covering, among other subjects, the scope of the worst forms of child labour and the trafficking of children. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on this survey, including statistics and information on the nature, extent and trends of the worst forms of child labour, the number of children covered by the measures giving effect to the Convention, the number and nature of infringements reported and penal sanctions applied. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex.

A request relating to other points is also being addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Czech Republic

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee had previously noted the ICFTU's indication that children are trafficked from Eastern European countries and the former Soviet Union to the Czech Republic for the purposes of prostitution, and Czech children are also trafficked to Western Europe. The Committee had also noted the following sections of the Penal Code which deal with trafficking: section 216a (trade in children); section 216b (definition of child as per section 216 and 216a); and section 246 (trade in women for sexual relations). The Committee had requested the Government to supply a copy of section 246 of the Penal Code as amended by Act No. 134/2002, which extends its application to boys and young men. The Committee noted with satisfaction the Government's information that a new provision under section 232a, which repeals and replaces section 246 of the Penal Code, has been introduced in the Penal Code by Act No. 537/2004. According to this provision, a person who engages, arranges, hires, entraps, transports, hides or detains a person younger than 18 years, by force, threat, violence or otherwise, for the purposes of sexual exploitation, slavery or serfdom, forced labour or other forms of exploitation shall be punished with imprisonment from two to ten years.

Clause (b). Using, procuring or offering a child for prostitution. The Committee had previously noted the ICFTU's indication that the forced prostitution of children is a serious and increasing problem in the country. Following its previous comments on the matter, the Committee noted the Government's information that a new section 217a was introduced in the Penal Code by Act No. 218/2003. The Committee noted that, according to this section, any person who offers, promises or provides payment or any other benefit for sexual intercourse or self-abuse, denudation or other similar acts to a person younger than 18 years, shall be punished with imprisonment for two years or by a fine.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. The police. The Committee noted the Government's information that, within the framework of the National Plan of Action against the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children, the Criminality Prevention Department of the Ministry of Interior, in cooperation with the United Kingdom embassy, organized a two-day seminar in March 2005 for specialists from the criminal police and other professionals of the Czech Republic. This seminar focused on the commercial sexual exploitation and abuse of children, the offenders' typology and tactics for questioning them, understanding of the offender's behaviour when travelling abroad for sexual tourism, women as offenders and Internet criminality distributing child pornography. The Committee noted that the seminar continued in 2006 for the same group. The Committee also noted that various training programmes of police secondary schools were used to train policemen with regard to the legislation; the examination of witnesses; the psychology of persons younger than 15 years; and basic professional preparation to get acquainted with crimes related to the sexual abuse of children and youth, etc. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the impact of the above measures taken within the framework of the National Plan of Action Against the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children on increasing police effectiveness in combating the commercial sexual exploitation of children under 18 years.

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. National Plan against the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that a National Plan against the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children was adopted in 2000 with a view to eliminating child prostitution and child pornography. The Committee noted the Government's information that within the framework of this national plan, the Criminality Prevention Department (CPD) of the Ministry of Interior provided, financially and organizationally, education to Roma social assistants and street workers in topics related to child prostitution. The Committee also noted that the CPD training plan included a two-day educational training by La Strada Organisation, on psychosocial care for threatened children and children exposed to sexual and commercial sexual abuse. The Committee noted the Government's indication that, in 2006, a training for the Roma assistants will be conducted by the Brno organization which has been realizing a pilot project called SASTIPEN-CR-Health and Social Assistants in Excluded Localities. The Committee further noted the Government's indication that a National Strategy to Combat Trafficking in Persons for the period 2005-07 was approved by government resolution No. 957/2005. The Committee also noted that a National Plan to Abolish Commercial Sexual Abuse of Children for the period 2006-08 is currently under preparation. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of these measures on the elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children under 18, particularly prostitution. The Committee further requests the Government to supply information on the implementation of the National Strategy to Combat Trafficking in Persons (2005-07) and the National Plan to Abolish the Commercial Sexual Abuse of Children (2006-08) as soon as it has been adopted as well as the results achieved.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Penalties. The Committee noted that the new section 232a on trafficking in persons introduced in the Penal Code by Act No. 537/2004 and which replaces section 246 (trade in women for sexual relations) of the Penal Code carries penalties of imprisonment from two to ten years. Section 217a of the Penal Code states that any person who offers, promises or provides payment or any other benefit for sexual intercourse or self-abuse, denudation or other similar acts to a person younger than 18 years is liable to imprisonment for two years and a fine. The Committee noted the statistics provided in the Government's report on the crimes committed under sections 246, 232a and 217a of the Penal Code. According to these statistics, under section 246 for the year 2003: five crimes were committed and five people were sentenced; in 2004: 12 crimes committed and 12 people sentenced; in 2005: 20 crimes committed and 20 people sentenced. Under section 232a for the first quarter of 2006: two crimes were committed by two people for which the legal procedure is pending. With regard to section 217a: in 2004, three people were sentenced; in 2005, six people were sentenced; and in the first quarter of 2006, 11 crimes were committed, out of which eight people were sentenced. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the application of the above penalties in practice.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Time-bound measures. Clause (a). Measures taken to prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. The Committee noted the Government's information that the problem of the commercial sexual abuse of children is included in the professional training of pedagogical staff, and that the Ministry of Education, Youth and Sports (MEYS) elaborated a strategy for the prevention of sociopathological effects in children and youth within schools, in relation to commercial sexual abuse. The Committee noted that the MEYS in cooperation with the Pedagogic Research Institute initiated two projects: the first was a training programme entitled "Reducing the incidence of child pornography"; and the second one was concerned with the creation of a methodological manual for teachers called "Sex education – child pornography and its prevention at school". The Committee also noted the Government's information that a pilot inquiry called "Prevention of Commercial Sexual Abuse of Children in Educational Institutions for Youth and Child Homes with Schools" conducted by MEYS in 2004 with a sample of pupils of an average age of 16.6 years revealed that most of the children had problems of truancy, including sexual abuse in the family which led them to run away from the family. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the abovementioned measures in preventing the commercial sexual exploitation of children.

Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee had previously noted that the programme on the implementation of measures to eliminate the worst forms of child labour of 2003 indicates that the Ministry of Labour and Social affairs and the Ministry of Health shall support long-term therapeutic work with child victims of criminal offences and their families and ensure their protection from further victimization. The Committee noted the Government's information that institutions, such as centres of educational care, diagnostic institutions, children's homes with access to schools and educational institutions provide care for victims of the worst forms of child labour, children hailing from problematic families and children having problems with truancy. The Committee noted the Government's information that within the framework of the National Plan of Action against the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children, the Criminology Prevention Department of the Ministry of Interior established interrogation rooms for traumatized victims, especially children, with the aim of preventing secondary victimization of the commercial sexual abuse of such victims. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the abovementioned measures on removing children from commercial sexual exploitation and providing for their rehabilitation and social integration.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning certain other points.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or similar practices. 1. Sale and trafficking of children for sexual exploitation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of July 2001 (CRC/C/15/Add.153, paragraphs 68 and 69), expressed grave concern at the information concerning the sale, trafficking, abduction and exploitation for pornography of young girls and boys in the country or from the country to another country. It considered that it was a matter of great concern that the national legislation does not sufficiently protect children from trafficking and recommended that the Government adopt appropriate legislation and penalize persons responsible for such practices. The Committee noted that section 67 of the Penal Code prohibits the forcible abduction, arrest or detention of any person. Furthermore, section 68 of the Penal Code prohibits the abduction, arrest or detention of any person for sale as a slave or the use of persons placed under one's authority for the same purpose. The Committee observed that the provisions of the Penal Code penalizing the sale and trafficking of children for sexual exploitation are not adequate, in view of the scale of the phenomenon in the country, and asked the Government to take the necessary measures to prohibit and penalize this worst form of child labour.

The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government to the effect that article 16(3) and (4) of the Constitution of the Democratic Republic of the Congo of 18 February 2006 states that no person may be kept in slavery or in similar conditions; no person may be subjected to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment; and no person may be subjected to forced or compulsory labour. The Committee notes with interest the Government's statement to the effect that section 174j of the Penal Code, incorporated in the Code in July 2006, states that any person committing an act or transaction relating to the trafficking or sexual exploitation of children or any other person, in return for remuneration or any other benefit, shall be liable to penal servitude ranging from ten to 20 years. Moreover, the Committee notes the Government's statement that Act No. 06/18 strengthens the measures to penalize rape and introduces new provisions with regard to other offences, including enticing minors into debauchery or forced prostitution, trafficking and sexual exploitation of children, and pornography. The Committee requests the Government to supply a copy of section 174j of the Penal Code and Act No. 06/18. It also requests the Government to provide information on the application of section 174j of the Penal Code and Act No. 06/18 in practice, including, in particular, statistics on the number and nature of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed.

2. Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. The Committee noted that article 184 of the Transitional Constitution provides that no one shall be recruited into the armed forces of the Democratic Republic of the Congo or take part in war or hostilities unless they have reached the age of 18 years at the time of recruitment. It also noted that the Government adopted Legislative Decree No. 066 of 9 June 2000 concerning the demobilization and reintegration of vulnerable groups present within the fighting forces (Legislative Decree No. 066). The Committee also noted that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General on children and armed conflict of 9 February 2005 (A/59/695-S/2005/72, paragraphs 15–22), even though positive steps have been taken, including the integration of several armed groups into the Forces armées de la République démocratique du Congo (FARDC), the new national army, these various military units were still not fully integrated and, in many cases, they were only theoretically part of the FARDC and some of them continued to use children. According to the report, despite a certain amount of progress, thousands of children remained in the country's armed forces and armed groups, and recruitment, albeit not systematic, was continuing.

The Committee notes the United Nations Secretary-General's report of 28 June 2007 on children and armed conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (S/2007/391), which covers the period from June 2006 to May 2007. It also notes the United Nations Secretary-General's report of 21 December 2007 on children and armed conflict (A/62/609-S/2007/757, paragraphs 6–9 and 38–45), which covers the period from October 2006 to August 2007. According to these reports, the number of children recruited by the armed groups and armed forces has fallen by 8 per cent, which can be attributed in particular to the progress made in the implementation of the programme for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of children, the integration of the army, the reduction in the number of combat zones and the action taken by child protection networks against the recruitment of children. However, the parties to the conflict continue to abduct, recruit and use children. The number of children in the FARDC-integrated and non-integrated brigades remains high, particularly in the Ituri region and the two Kivu provinces.

According to the reports of the United Nations Secretary-General, recruitment of children was intensified in North Kivu, and also in Rwanda and Uganda, prior to and throughout the mixage (integration) process, which appears to be linked to the strategy of commanders loyal to Laurent Nkunda to increase the number of troops to be integrated and strengthen the forces before engaging in combat operations against the Forces démocratiques de libération du Rwanda (FDLR) and the Mai-Mai in North Kivu. Children who fled or were released indicated that recruitment was continuing actively in the returnee settlements of Buhambwe, Masisi territory, the Kiziba and Byumba refugee camps in Rwanda, the towns of Byumba and Mutura in Rwanda and the town of Bunagana on the border between the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Uganda. Mai-Mai groups still active in North Kivu were alleged still to be recruiting children, including girls.

The Committee notes that, according to the two 2007 reports of the Secretary-General, the number of abductions reported in the region of Ituri and the provinces of North and South Kivu remains high. The abducted children have been recruited by armed groups in 30 per cent of cases, been victims of rape in 13 per cent of cases, and subjected to forced labour (carrying the equipment of armed elements during troop redeployments) in 2 per cent of cases. Furthermore, in 17 per cent of cases, the victims were children previously associated with armed groups whom the FARDC arrested in order to make them provide information on the groups or extort money from their families. Moreover, even though there has been a reduction in the number of injuries or murders involving children, children continue to be victims of the fighting. Despite the adoption of two laws against sexual violence on 20 July 2006, the number of incidents of rape and other sexual violence against children remains extremely high. Furthermore, the Secretary-General indicates that children have been detained for alleged association with armed groups, in violation of international standards, and are subjected to mistreatment and torture and deprived of food.

The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government to the effect that it is giving its fullest attention to the forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict and is doing its utmost to stop them being enlisted. In order to enforce the applicable legislation, the Government is taking steps, in cooperation with the International Criminal Court, to prosecute Mr Thomas Lubanga, a warlord operating in Ituri. In addition, proceedings have also been instituted at the Auditorat militaire (military prosecutor's office) of Lubumbashi garrison in Katanga province against Mr Kyungu Mutanga, warlord of the Mai-Mai "negative forces" of North Katanga, who is facing the same charges. As regards the national armed forces, the FARDC central command issued an explicit instruction in May 2005 to all commanders not to recruit children under 18 years of age and that anyone failing to comply would face severe penalties. The FARDC chief military prosecutor subsequently instructed all garrison prosecutors to prosecute any individual violating the law or military orders. On this basis, the military tribunal of Bukavu garrison convicted Major Biyoyo of the former Mudundu movement on 17 March 2006 for insurrection, desertion abroad and the arbitrary arrest and illegal detention of children in South Kivu in April 2004. However, the Government recognizes that, despite the progress made in the penalization of child recruitment, the continued fighting in certain areas increases the risk of children being enlisted. This has been the case in Ituri and the provinces of North and South Kivu, where the abduction of some 30 children, including girls, has been reported.

The Committee notes that the Government has adopted certain measures to end the impunity which has been enjoyed by perpetrators of the forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict, particularly on an international scale, through its collaboration with the International Criminal Court for instituting legal proceedings against Mr Thomas Lubanga, and on a national scale, through the legal proceedings instituted against Mr Kyungu Mutanga. However, the Committee notes that, despite these measures taken by the Government, children are still being recruited and forced to join illegal armed groups or the armed forces. It expresses its profound concern with regard to the persistence of this practice, especially as it leads to other violations of the rights of children, in the form of abductions, murders and sexual violence. It also voices its concern with regard to the detention of children for presumed association with armed groups, in violation of international standards. The Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to improve the situation and to adopt, as a matter of urgency, immediate and effective measures to put a stop in practice to the forced recruitment of children under 18 years of age by armed groups and the armed forces, particularly in Ituri, North Kivu and South Kivu, and to supply information on any new measure taken to this end. With reference to Security Council resolution No. 1612 of 26 July 2005, which recalls “the responsibilities of States to end impunity and to prosecute those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other egregious crimes perpetrated against children”, the Committee urges the Government to take measures to ensure that sufficiently effective and deterrent penalties are imposed on persons found guilty of recruiting or using children under 18 years of age for the purposes of armed conflict. It requests the Government to supply information in this regard. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to send a copy of Legislative Decree No. 066 of 9 June 2000 concerning the demobilization and reintegration of vulnerable groups present in the fighting forces.

Clause (d). Hazardous work. Mines. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the observations from the Confederation of Trade Unions of the Congo to the effect that young persons under 18 years of age are employed in mineral quarries in the provinces of Katanga and East Kasai. The Committee also noted that the United Nations Special Rapporteur, in her report of April 2003 on the situation of human rights in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (E/CN.4/2003/43, paragraph 59), noted that military units are recruiting children for forced labour, especially for the extraction of natural resources. The Special Rapporteur added that non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in South Kivu had informed her of children being recruited by armed groups to work in mines. The Committee further noted that, under section 32 of Ministerial Order No. 68/13 of 17 May 1968 determining the conditions of work of women and children (Order No. 68/13), the extraction of minerals, shale, materials and debris from mines, open-cast mines and quarries, and also earthworks, are prohibited for young persons under 18 years of age. The Committee noted that section 326 of the Labour Code establishes penalties for violations of the provisions of Article 3, paragraph 2(d), relating to hazardous work. The Committee observed that, although the legislation is in conformity with the Convention on this point, child labour in mines is a problem in practice.

The Committee notes the Government's statement confirming the allegations made by the Confederation of Trade Unions of the Congo on the exploitation of young persons under 18 years of age in mineral quarries in the provinces of Katanga and East Kasai. It also notes that section 13(13) of the recently adopted Ministerial Order No. 12/CAB.MIN/TPS/045/08 of 8 August 2008 determining the working conditions of children prohibits the employment of young persons under 18 years of age in work performed underground, under water, at dangerous heights or in confined spaces. Moreover, the Committee notes the Government's indication that measures will be taken by the Committee for the Elimination of Child Labour and also by the labour inspectorate. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the measures which will be taken by the Committee for the Elimination of Child Labour and by the labour inspectorate to prohibit hazardous work for children in mines. It also requests the Government to provide information on the effective application of the legislation on the protection of children in practice against hazardous work in mines, including, for example, statistics on the number and nature of offences reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. 1. Sale and trafficking of children for sexual exploitation. The Committee noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of July 2001 (CRC/C/15/Add.153, paragraph 69), recommended that the Government provide the police force and border guards with special training to help in combating the sale, trafficking and sexual exploitation of children, and establish programmes to provide assistance, including rehabilitation and social reintegration, to the child victims of sexual exploitation.

The Government states in its report that it has established a multi-sectoral cooperation and action framework to prevent and respond to violence inflicted on women, young persons and children, a framework which includes the ministries responsible for human rights, women and the family, and social affairs, United Nations agencies, including the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), and also NGOs. Action taken within this framework includes the adoption of laws on sexual violence, awareness raising so that victims report their aggressors, psychological and social support for victims, medical support through the creation or reinforcement of health centre facilities to provide suitable care for victims, and legal support through the setting up of legal advice centres. The Committee notes the measures taken by the Government to remove children from sale and trafficking for sexual exploitation and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It requests the Government to intensify its efforts and supply information in its next report on the number of children who have actually been removed from this worst form of child labour and on specific measures which have been adopted to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of these children.

2. Child soldiers. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, according to the reports of the United Nations Secretary-General of 28 June 2007 and 21 December 2007, the national programme for disarmament, demobilization and reintegration expressly provided for the release of children. The operational framework for children associated with armed forces and groups was launched in May 2004, and approximately 30,000 children, including those who had been released before the adoption of the operational framework, were separated from the armed forces and groups between 2003 and December 2006. Of this number, 15,167 received assistance with reintegration, with 6,066 receiving aid to enable them to return to school and 9,010 enrolling in programmes designed to equip them for finding the means of subsistence. Implementation of the national programme for disarmament, demobilization and reintegration was delayed because of the brassage process and at times it proved difficult to release the children. In addition, according to the Secretary-General's reports, 4,182 children, including 629 girls, were released from the armed forces and groups in the east of the country during the reporting periods. In Ituri, 2,472 children, including 564 girls, were able to leave the ranks of the MRC, FRPI and FNI militias. In North Kivu, 1,374 children, including 52 girls, were released and in South Kivu, 336 children, including 13 girls, were also released.

The Government states in its report that the issue of registering the girls and removing them from the armed forces is a sensitive matter. Afraid of being socially excluded if they are found to have been associated with armed forces or groups, the girls prefer to return discreetly to civilian life. The Government also states that a programme to raise community awareness regarding family reunification and the social-economic reintegration of children released from armed forces and groups has been implemented in all the provinces of the country. In this context, children are catered for in employment centres, searches are undertaken with a view to family reunification and social and economic reintegration measures are taken. However, programmes for the economic reintegration of children are hampered by the lack of possibilities available to improve their economic situation and the financial problems arising from a lack of long-term support mechanisms. As a result, the children are at risk of being re-enlisted in the armed forces or groups. However, the Government points out that it expects to resolve the financial problems in order to revive the programme for the social, vocational and economic reintegration of children. As regards the measures for psychological rehabilitation, the Government acknowledges that the transitional support structures are deficient. The impact on some children has been so great that they find it difficult to readjust to family life. The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government on the measures it has taken to improve the situation. In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to intensify its efforts and adopt time-bound measures to remove children from armed forces and groups, with special attention given to girls. Furthermore, it requests the Government to revive the programme for social, vocational and economic reintegration and improve the implementation of psychological rehabilitation measures. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the number of young persons under 18 years of age who have been rehabilitated and integrated into their communities.

The Committee is also raising a number of other issues in a direct request to the Government.

Dominica

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee recalled that, under section 3 of the Employment of Children Prohibition Ordinance, the minimum age of admission to employment was 12 years and that, under section 4, subsections (1) and (5), of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance, the minimum age is 14 years. The Government, however, specified a minimum age of 15 years when it ratified the Convention. It once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures in order to raise the statutory minimum age to 15 years, in accordance with this provision of the Convention.

The Committee further noted that the statutory provisions on minimum age applied only to persons employed under an employment relationship or under a contract of employment, whereas the Convention also covered work performed outside any employment relationship, including work performed by young persons on their own account. The Committee hopes that the Government will indicate the measures taken or envisaged to give full effect to the Convention on this point.

Article 3. Hazardous work. The Committee recalled that no higher minimum age had been fixed for work which is likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of young people, other than night work. It once again urges the Government to take measures so as to set such higher minimum age(s) in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 1, of the Convention, and to determine the types of employment or work to which higher minimum age(s) should apply, in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Convention.

Article 7. Light work. The Committee noted that the national legislation allowed exceptions to the above minimum ages as regards the employment of children under the age of 12 years in domestic work or agricultural work of a light nature at home by the parents or guardian of such children (section 3 of the Employment of Children Prohibition Ordinance) and the employment of children under the age of 14 years in an undertaking or on a ship where only members of the same family are employed (section 4, subsection 1 and section 5, of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance). The Committee recalled that under this Article of the Convention, national laws or regulations may permit the employment or work of persons 13 to 15 years of age on light work which is: (a) not likely to be harmful to their health or development; and (b) not such as to prejudice their attendance at school, their participation in vocational orientation or training programmes approved by the competent authority or their capacity to benefit from the instruction received. Another condition is that the activities involved and the conditions of work and employment should be determined by the competent authority. It hopes that the Government will take measures to restrict, in accordance with this provision, the possibility to employ children below the minimum age specified, and to determine the activities and conditions of their employment or work.

As regards the Government's reference to the work of family members as the category excluded under Article 4, the Committee pointed out that the exceptions under this provision must be listed in the first report after ratification, and that the Government declared in its first report, received in February 1988, that no use was made of this provision.

Article 9, paragraph 3. Keeping of registers. The Committee noted that section 8, subsection (1), of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance provided for the keeping of registers or lists of young persons of less than 16 years of age, whereas the Convention describes the keeping of such registers of persons of less than 18 years of age. It noted the Government's indication that this provision is not applied in practice. The Committee nevertheless pointed out that the Government has an obligation to give effect to the provisions of the Convention in law and practice. It therefore once again asks the Government to take the necessary measures so that registers or other documents are kept by the employer concerning workers younger than 18 years of age.

The Committee noted the Government's indication that the provisions of the Convention are upheld by custom and practice. Pending the necessary amendments to the legislative provisions as requested above, the Committee once again asks the Government to supply detailed information on how the Convention is applied in practice, as required under Part V of the report form, including, for instance, extracts from official reports, statistics, and information on inspection visits made and contraventions reported.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Dominican Republic

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

Article 2, paragraphs 1 and 4, of the Convention and Part V of the report form. Minimum age for admission to employment or work and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which child labour is a major problem in the Dominican Republic. Owing to high unemployment and poverty, particularly among the Haitian community, children enter the labour market at a young age and work in the informal economy or in agriculture. Moreover, the number of Haitian children working in sugar plantations alongside their parents is increasing. In reply to the ITUC's observations, the Government indicated that the Dominican Republic is a very poor country and that it could not deny that children enter the labour market at a very young age. However, with the technical assistance of the ILO-IPEC, it is taking measures to eliminate child labour, for example to remove children who are working in the agricultural sector. The Government also indicated that all children, irrespective of their nationality and including children of Haitian nationality, have to attend school. Furthermore, the Secretariat of State for Labour, in collaboration with the Secretariat of State for Education (SEE), has formulated a plan of action under which labour inspectors who identify children not attending school have to inform the SEE, irrespective of their nationality.

The Committee noted that, according to the statistics contained in the Report on the results of the national study on child labour in the Dominican Republic, published in 2004 by the ILO-IPEC, SIMPOC and the Secretariat of State for Labour, around 436,000 children aged between five and 17 years, were working in the Dominican Republic in 2000. Of these, 21 per cent were aged between five and nine years and 44 per cent were between ten and 14. The Committee noted that the sectors of economic activity most affected by child labour were services in urban areas and agriculture in rural areas. Furthermore, there were also many children working in the commercial and industrial sectors. The Committee noted that, in the context of the ILO-IPEC Time-bound Programme (TBP) on the worst forms of child labour, the Government has implemented several programmes of action in the agricultural and urban sectors to eliminate child domestic labour. According to the information available to the Office, these programmes should benefit around 25,200 boys and girls under 18 years of age and over 2,850 families. The Committee noted the adoption of the National Strategic Plan for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (2006–16), which is the country's response to resolving the problem of child labour.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, in collaboration with the ILO-IPEC, it continues to take steps to eliminate child labour, in particular to remove children from agricultural plantations. Furthermore, an ongoing awareness-raising campaign on the radio and television has been launched in the country's towns. The Committee also notes that the Government is participating in the ILO-IPEC project entitled "Elimination of Child Labour in Latin America (Central American Component)". It also notes the adoption of a Decent Work Country Programme (2008–11) and that it takes into account child labour. Furthermore, it notes that the TBP is still in progress in the country.

The Committee notes that, according to the statistics mentioned above, the application of the legislation on child labour seems difficult and that child labour constitutes a problem in practice in the country. It expresses its deep concern at the situation of children under the age of 14 years who are compelled to work in the Dominican Republic. The Committee firmly requests the Government to step up efforts to abolish child labour in the country. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken within the framework of the National Strategic Plan for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (2006–16), the ILO–IPEC project on the elimination of child labour in Latin America, the Decent Work Country Programme (2008–11) and the TBP, in particular on the programmes of action which will be implemented to gradually abolish child labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved. It also invites the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, including, for example, statistical data on the employment of children and adolescents, extracts from the reports of the inspection services, particularly inspections carried out in the sectors mentioned above.

Furthermore, the Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report contains no reply to its previous comments. It hopes that the next report will include full information on the matters raised in its previous direct request which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Slavery and similar practices. Sale and trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the observations made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), to the effect that the trafficking of human beings, including children, for commercial sexual exploitation is a serious problem in the Dominican Republic, particularly in the tourist industry. The ITUC added that, despite the severe penalties set out in the national legislation for the trafficking of persons and the efforts made by the Government to eliminate this practice, the problem remains very widespread. In this respect, the Government recognized the existence in the country of cases in which children are offered for prostitution and indicated that the national legislation, namely the Code for the protection of the rights of boys, girls and young persons of 2003, and Act No. 137-03 of 7 August 2003 respecting the smuggling of migrants and the trafficking of persons (hereinafter Act No. 137-03 of 7 August 2003), prohibits the sale and trafficking of children for prostitution. The Committee also noted that, according to the study entitled “Commercial sexual exploitation of young persons in the Dominican Republic”, published in 2002 by ILO–IPEC, the children involved in the commercial sexual exploitation sector are aged between 10 and 17 years. It requested the Government to step up its efforts to secure the effective enforcement of the legislation protecting children against sale and trafficking for sexual exploitation, and particularly prostitution, and requested it to provide information on the application of penalties in practice.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government. It also noted that, according to the information available to the Office, in the context of the ILO–IPEC regional project entitled “Participation in preventing and eliminating the commercial sexual exploitation of children in Central America, Panama and the Dominican Republic”, legislative measures should have been adopted to amend Act No. 137-03 of 7 August 2003 and the Penal Code with a view to reflecting accurately the content of international instruments on the trafficking of persons, including trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee indicated that it considered that the adoption of new legislation is bound to improve the protection in relation to the trafficking of children, particularly for commercial sexual exploitation, already established by the legal provisions currently in force in the Dominican Republic. It once again hopes that the reforms will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to provide information on any progress achieved in this respect. The Committee once again encourages the Government to step up its efforts to secure in practice the protection of young persons under 18 years of age against sale and trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation and requests it to continue providing information on the imposition of penalties in practice including, for example, reports on the number of convictions.

Article 6. Programmes of action. National Plan for the Elimination of the Abuse and Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Boys, Girls and Young Persons. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee noted with interest the National Plan for the Elimination of the Abuse and Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Boys, Girls and Young Persons. It noted the activities envisaged by the Plan to combat commercial sexual exploitation in the country. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the programmes of action established in the context of the National Plan referred to above and the results achieved.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the commercial sexual exploitation of children was one of the worst forms of child labour in respect of which the Government has undertaken to adopt measures as a priority in the context of the ILO–IPEC Time-bound Programme (TBP) on the worst forms of child labour. The Committee noted with interest that, in the context of the ILO–IPEC regional project entitled “Participation in preventing and eliminating the commercial sexual exploitation of children in Central America, Panama and the Dominican Republic”, over 870 children should have been removed from commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking and around 850 children at special risk of this worst form of child labour should have been prevented from being engaged therein. Furthermore, over 1,000 children should benefit directly from this project.

Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. 1. TBP and ILO–IPEC regional project. Taking into account the information referred to above concerning the number of children who will be prevented from being engaged in commercial sexual exploitation or in trafficking for this purpose, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in the context of the TBP and the ILO–IPEC regional project to protect these children. It also once again requests the Government to provide statistical data on the number of children who will in practice be prevented from being engaged in this worst form of child labour as a result of the implementation of the TBP and the ILO–IPEC regional project in the Dominican Republic.

2. Other measures. The Committee noted that the ILO–IPEC regional project on the prevention and elimination of commercial sexual exploitation of children provides for the strengthening of national institutional capacities. The Committee considered that collaboration and the exchange of information between the various actors at the national and local levels concerned with the commercial sexual exploitation of children, such as government agencies, employers’ and workers’ organizations, non-governmental organizations and other civil society organizations, constitute indispensable measures to prevent and eliminate commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted for this purpose. As the country benefits from widespread tourist activity, the Committee also once again requests the Government to indicate whether measures have been taken to raise awareness among actors directly related to the tourist industry, such as associations of hotel owners, tourist operators, unions of taxi drivers and owners of bars, restaurants and their employees.

Clause (b). Assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of children and the results achieved in removing children from commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for this purpose as a result of the implementation of the TBP. It noted that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject. As the ILO–IPEC regional project envisages removing a greater number of children from this worst form of child labour, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide statistical data on the number of children who will in practice be removed from commercial sexual exploitation and trafficking for this purpose as a result of the implementation of the TBP and the ILO–IPEC regional project in the Dominican Republic. It also once again requests the Government to provide information on the economic alternatives envisaged and on the measures adopted to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of children removed from the worst forms of child labour.

Article 8. International cooperation. 1. Commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee noted that the ILO–IPEC regional project on the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children envisages the strengthening of horizontal collaboration between countries participating in the project. The Committee indicated that it considered that international cooperation between law enforcement agencies, particularly the judicial authorities and police forces, is indispensable to prevent and eliminate commercial sexual exploitation, and particularly the sale and trafficking of children for that purpose, through the compilation and exchange of information and through assistance to identify and prosecute the individuals involved and repatriate the victims. The Committee therefore once again hopes that, in the context of the implementation of the ILO–IPEC regional project on the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children, the Government will take measures to cooperate with participating countries, thereby reinforcing security measures as a means of bringing an end to this worst form of child labour. It once again requests the Government to provide information on this subject.

2. Poverty reduction. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee noted that both the Strategic National Plan for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (2005–15) and the National Plan to Eliminate the Abuse and Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Boys, Girls and Young Persons envisage strategic measures for the reduction of poverty in the country. The Committee also noted that, according to the statistical data provided by the Government, around 60 per cent of minors under 14 years of age lived in poverty in 2001. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved as a result of the implementation of the two Plans referred to above, particularly in terms of the effective reduction of poverty among children removed from commercial sexual exploitation and from sale and trafficking for this purpose.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Ecuador

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the statistical information from the National Institute of Statistics and Census (INEC) of 2005, to the effect that the number of child workers between 5 and 17 years of age in the country was decreasing. It also noted the Government's statement that the child labour inspection and monitoring service had been reinforced since 2004. The Committee also noted that Ecuador had implemented a Time-bound Programme (TBP) in order to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, particularly the work of children in the banana and flower industries.

The Committee notes with interest the detailed information sent by the Government concerning the results achieved further to the implementation of the TBP, which ended in June 2008. A total of 7,406 children were beneficiaries of the TBP. Of these, 5,250 children were prevented from becoming involved in one of the worst forms of child labour covered by the TBP and received educational services, and 2,156 children were removed from their work and were also provided with educational services. The Committee duly notes the detailed information provided by the Government on the measures taken to implement other programmes of action, such as the “Being” project and the “Pro-child” programme, for abolishing child labour and the worst forms thereof. Moreover, it notes the Government's indication that a review of the “National Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour” is in progress. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government on the results of the second national survey of child labour carried out by the INEC in 2006. According to this survey, 580,888 children and young persons were employed in forms of child labour to be abolished under the terms of the Convention. Of these, 164,551 were children between 5 and 11 years of age, 202,585 were adolescents between 12 and 14 years of age, and 213,752 were young persons engaged in hazardous work between 15 and 17 years of age. The Committee notes that, according to the national survey of child labour for 2006, child labour has decreased by 3 per cent in comparison with 2001.

The Committee also notes that, according to ILO–IPEC information, the Government has adopted various public policies, including the “Social agenda for children and young persons”, the “Ten-year National Plan for the full protection of children and young persons” and the “National Development Plan”. In the context of these public policies concerning children, measures will be taken to combat child labour. The Committee also notes that the Government is participating in the ILO–IPEC project on the “Elimination of child labour in Latin America (third phase, South America)”. While duly noting the measures taken by the Government to combat child labour, the Committee again notes that, according to the abovementioned statistics, the practice observed is still in contradiction with the legislation and the Convention. The Committee is deeply concerned at the situation of children under 14 years of age who are compelled to work and urges the Government to intensify its efforts to gradually improve the situation. It requests the Government to take the necessary steps, in the context of the various public policies mentioned above and the ILO-IPEC project on the "Elimination of child labour in Latin America", to abolish child labour. It requests the Government to supply information on the results achieved. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, including, for example, statistics relating to the employment of children and young persons, and extracts of the reports of the inspection services, particularly inspections conducted in the abovementioned sectors. Finally, it requests the Government to supply a copy of the new "National Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour", once it has been formulated.

Article 2, paragraphs 2 and 5. Raising the minimum age for admission to employment or labour to 15 years. The Committee noted the Government's statement that Act No. 2006-39 raised the minimum age for admission to employment or work from 14 to 15 years, thereby aligning the provisions of section 134(1) of the Labour Code with those of section 82(1) of the Children and Young Persons Code of 2003. It requested the Government to consider the possibility of sending the ILO Director-General a new declaration stating that Ecuador had raised the previously specified minimum age, in accordance with Article 2, paragraph 2, of the Convention. The Government indicates that it will recommend that the Ministry of Labour and Employment notify the Director-General that the minimum age for admission to employment or work has been raised from 14 to 15 years. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on any new developments in this regard.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee notes that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2006, the net primary school enrolment rate was 98 per cent for girls and 97 per cent for boys and the figures for secondary schools were 53 per cent for girls and 52 per cent for boys. The Committee duly notes that, according to the Education for All (EFA) Global Monitoring Report 2008 published by UNESCO entitled "Education for All by 2015: Will we make it?", Ecuador has achieved the objective of universal primary education for all and that of gender parity in both primary and secondary education. The Committee duly notes the net primary school enrolment rate. However, it expresses its concern with regard to the low net secondary school enrolment rate. It observes that poverty is one of the primary causes of child labour and, combined with a deficient education system, it hampers the development of the child. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to continue its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system in the country and to take measures to enable children to attend compulsory basic education or enter an informal school system. In this regard, it requests the Government to supply information on the measures taken to increase the secondary school enrolment rate. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to supply information on the results achieved.

Article 3, paragraph 2. Determination of hazardous work. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction resolution No. 016 CNNA-2008 of 8 May 2008, adopting regulations on hazardous work which is prohibited for young persons who are legally entitled to work in employment or on a self-employed basis. This resolution was adopted in consultation with the employers' and workers' organizations, and also with various other parties concerned with the problem of child labour. The Committee notes in particular that section 5 of these Regulations contains a very detailed list of types of work prohibited for young persons between 15 and 18 years of age. It also duly notes that section 6 of the Regulations fixes at 18 years of age the minimum age for admission to employment for young domestic workers who live in the homes of their employers. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that agreements concerning the types of work prohibited for young persons between 15 and 18 years of age in the banana and flower industries have been concluded. The Committee requests the Government to supply a copy of these agreements in its next report. It also requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of resolution No. 016 CNNA-2008 adopting regulations on hazardous work.

Article 8. Artistic performances. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's statement that Regulations issued under the Children and Young Persons Code will lay down the conditions of employment for children and young persons engaged in artistic activities or performances. The Committee notes the Government's information to the effect that the Regulations implementing the Children and Young Persons Code are in the process of being validated. The Committee reminds the Government that, under Article 8, paragraph 1, of the Convention, the competent authority may waive the minimum age of 14 years specified by Ecuador for admission to employment or work and, after consultation of the employers' and workers' organizations concerned, may grant permission in individual cases for purposes such as participation in artistic performances. It also reminds the Government that according to Article 8, paragraph 2, the permits so granted must limit the number of hours during which, and prescribe the conditions in which, employment or work is allowed. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the regulations implementing the Children and Young Persons Code will be adopted in the near future, will take account of the comments made above and will lay down the conditions of employment for children and young persons in artistic performances. It requests the Government to supply information on any new developments in this regard.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Article 3, clauses (a) and (b), of the Convention and Part III of the report form. Sale and trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation, the use of children for prostitution and court decisions. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to ILO–IPEC statistics, over 5,200 children were victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for this purpose in Ecuador. It also noted the adoption of Act No. 25-447 of 23 June 2005, reforming the Penal Code, which categorizes crimes involving the sexual exploitation of young persons under 18 years of age and establishes heavy penalties for persons found guilty of having committed a crime established under this Act.

The Committee notes that, according to a 2007 report on the worst forms of child labour in Ecuador, available on the UNHCR web site (www.unhcr.org), Colombian girls are trafficked to Ecuador for commercial sexual exploitation, and Ecuadorian children are trafficked to neighbouring countries and Spain. According to this report, it would seem that most children are trafficked within the country to urban centres, particularly for prostitution. The Committee also notes that the Committee on the Protection of the Right of Workers and their Migrant Families, in its final observations on Ecuador's initial report on December 2007 (CMW/C/ECU/CO/1, paragraph 32), while recognizing the efforts undertaken by the National Council for Children and Young Persons against the commercial sexual exploitation of children and trafficking for this purpose, was nevertheless concerned at the involvement of migrant children in prostitution, especially in the Lago Agrio region, and at the fact that there still seemed to be a sort of social acceptance of this criminal behaviour against children in Ecuadorian society.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the denunciations received by the National Police Unit specialized in the welfare of boys, girls and young persons (DINAPEN) concerning the commercial sexual exploitation of children. It notes that, between 2006 and June 2008, there had been a total of 184 denunciations, of which 153 concerned prostitution, including trafficking, 24 child pornography and eight sexual tourism. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that, since 2005, 14 persons have been sentenced for the exploitation of children under 18 years of age for sexual purposes in the cities of Machala and Quito. In Quito, five sentences were handed down for the trafficking of children for sexual exploitation and one for the procuring of children, while in Machala, five sentences were handed down for trafficking for sexual exploitation, two for procuring and two for pornography. The penalties applied ranged from between three and five years' imprisonment. The Committee encourages the Government to continue its efforts to ensure, in practice, the protection of children under 18 years of age against these worst forms of child labour. In this respect, it requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of the provisions of the Penal Code applying to the crimes of sexual exploitation against minors of less than 18 years of age in practice. Furthermore, taking account of the information that persons have been prosecuted and sentenced, the Committee requests the Government to provide copies of the judgements handed down by virtue of the provisions in the Penal Code in its next report.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. The Committee notes that, according to the information contained in the final ILO–IPEC report on the Time-bound Programme (TBP) for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour, of June 2008, persons working for the DINAPEN, in particular child labour inspectors and police officers, have received training on commercial sexual exploitation and trafficking for this purpose. The Committee also notes that, according to this report, judicial officials, including magistrates from various districts throughout the country, including those from Lago Agrio, Machala and Galapagos, have also received training on these worst forms of child labour. Furthermore, about 20 child labour inspectors have been appointed.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing children from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from these forms of labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Commercial sexual exploitation of children and the trafficking of children for this purpose. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in the context of the TPB, programmes of action were to be implemented to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children and the trafficking of children for this purpose. In this respect, the Committee notes, with interest, the detailed information provided by the Government on the results obtained following the implementation of the TPB, which ended in June 2008. It notes, more particularly, that a total of 1,174 children who were victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for this purpose benefited from the TPB. Out of this number, 1,037 children, of which 692 were girls and 345 boys, were prevented from being engaged in these worst forms of child labour, and 137 children, of which 135 were girls and two boys, were removed from these worst forms of child labour. The Committee further notes that according to the Government, the children who benefited from the TPB also received assistance in re-entering the formal or informal education system, or received vocational training. What is more, temporary accommodation and social and legal assistance were provided to the children who had been removed from these worst forms of child labour. Finally, assistance, especially in the form of grants, were offered to the families of children benefiting from the TPB.

The Committee takes due note of the Government's indication that it has adopted a national plan to combat the trafficking of persons, the illicit traffic of migrants, sexual exploitation, economic and other forms of exploitation, the prostitution of women, boys, girls and young persons, child pornography and the corruption of minors (National Plan to combat the trafficking of persons and commercial sexual exploitation). The Committee also notes that, in the districts of Cuenca and Machala, plans to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children and trafficking of children for this purpose have also been drawn up. Furthermore, according to the ILO–IPEC final report on the TPB of June 2008, the National Programme of protection for children and young people who are victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for this purpose is still in operation in the cities of Quito and Machala and will also be implemented in the region of Lago Agrio.

The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts and requests it to provide information on the time-bound measures taken, when implementing the National Plan to combat the trafficking of persons and commercial sexual exploitation and the plans to combat the commercial exploitation of children and the trafficking of children for this purpose in Cuenca and Machala, to: (a) prevent children from being victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for this purpose; and (b) provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance to remove child victims from these worst forms of child labour. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the results obtained. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the National Programme of protection for children and young persons who are victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for this purpose, especially with respect to the measures taken in the context of this programme to guarantee the rehabilitation and social integration of the victims of this worst form of child labour.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. Commercial sexual exploitation of children and trafficking of children for this purpose. In its previous comments, the Committee expressed the hope that, in the context of the implementation of the TPB, the Government would take measures to cooperate with neighbouring countries, particularly through the reinforcement of security measures on common borders. In this respect the Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government that it participated in a meeting with Peru and Colombia to coordinate actions with a view to exchanging information on the commercial sexual exploitation of children and the trafficking of children for this purpose. Agreements had been reached on an exchange of information between the police and judicial services. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the exchanges of information with Peru and Colombia, carried out in the context of the agreements signed between the police and judicial services, have made it possible: (a) to identify and arrest persons working in networks involving the trafficking of children; and (b) to detect and intercept child victims of trafficking at the borders.

Furthermore, the Committee is addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Egypt

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy on the effective abolition of child labour. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's information that awareness campaigns were conducted in undertakings, and workshops in particular, on the prohibition of engaging children under the legal age for admission to employment. The Government also indicates that programmes are broadcast on several radio stations for the purpose of raising awareness on the issue of child labour. In this regard, an agreement was reached between the Government and the radio of southern Sinai to broadcast a five-minute daily programme on child labour. The Committee further notes the Government's information that a Protocol was prepared between the Department of Manpower and Migration in Alexandria and the Network on the Elimination of Child Labour, which includes ten non-governmental organizations working in this field and some executive bodies in the governorate of Alexandria, so as to prepare and implement a plan for the coordination of such bodies to eliminate the employment of children who have not reached the legal age of admission to employment or work. Finally, the Committee notes that, according to information made available by UNICEF, the Government has drafted a national strategy to combat child labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in the adoption of the draft national strategy to combat child labour and to provide a copy of it as soon as it is adopted. It also requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved through the implementation of these measures on the prevention and elimination of child labour.

Article 2, paragraph 1. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee had previously noted that Labour Code No. 12 of 2003 (Labour Code) in section 99 of Chapter 3, Part VI, provides that the employment of female or male children shall be prohibited until they complete their basic education, or have reached the age of 14, whichever is higher. The Committee notes the Government's information that Child Law Act No. 12 of 1996 (Child Law), which provided for the prohibition of the employment or work for children under 14 years of age, was amended to prohibit the employment of children under the age of 15. However, the Committee observes that both Law No. 126 of 2008 on Amending Provisions of the Child Law, Penal Code and Civil Status, as well as the text of the Child Law dated October 2008, provide that children shall not be employed for work before attaining "fourteen complete calendar years of age", which is the age that was specified by the Government at the time of ratification.

Part III of the report form. Labour inspection. The Committee had previously noted that, in its concluding observations, the Committee on the Rights of the Child noted that 80 per cent of child labour is reportedly concentrated in the agricultural sector and that "many of these children work long hours in dusty environments, without masks or respirators, receiving little or no training on safety precautions for work with toxic pesticides and herbicides" (CRC/C/15/Add.145, paragraph 49, of 21 February 2000). The Committee had requested the Government to indicate in what manner it is ensured that children who work in pure cultivation work in the agricultural sector, which is one of the categories of work excluded by the Government at the time of ratification, are protected from carrying out work which is likely to jeopardize their health, safety or morals.

The Committee notes the Government's information that, this year, inspections were carried out in 41,618 undertakings that employ children, during which the number of children reached was 39,251. As a result, 9,083 undertakings were given warnings to remedy violations with regard to child labour, and 548 minutes were prepared for the violations detected. The Committee also notes that, according to a 2007 report on findings on the worst forms of child labour in Egypt, available on the High Commissioner for Refugees web site (www.unhcr.org), a separate unit within the Ministry of Manpower and Migration (MOMM) is responsible for child labour investigations in the agricultural sector. In this regard, it notes the Government's information, in its report under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that inspections are conducted on commercial plantations with a large agricultural production and child labour inspectors endeavour to enforce the legislation regarding children working in agriculture. As a result, the MOMM reported that its 2,000 labour inspectors issued 72,000 citation violations between 2006 and the first nine months of 2007. While observing the number of inspections that were carried out concerning children working in the agricultural sector, the Committee notes that no information is contained in the inspection reports, communicated to the Office along with the Government's report under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), with regard to such children. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide information on the violations, including violations of the prohibition of hazardous work, detected by labour inspectors with regard to children working in the agricultural sector.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee had previously noted that, according to the report of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), for the World Trade Organization General Council on the trade policies of Egypt of 26 and 28 July 2005, entitled "Internationally recognized core labour standards in Egypt", 6 per cent of children aged 5–14 are involved in labour activities, 78 per cent of whom are in the agricultural sector. In the rural sector, children are employed in commercial as well as subsistence agriculture. Moreover, children often work in repair and craft shops, in heavier industries such as brick making and textiles, and as workers in leather and carpet-making factories. The ITUC adds that, even if the fines that child offenders have to pay in child labour cases were increased, there is still clear evidence of employers who abuse, overwork and many times endanger many child workers. The ITUC concludes that child labour is employed extensively in Egypt, in both the rural and the urban sectors and, despite recent legislative improvements combined with some governmental programmes to tackle this issue, it remains a serious case for concern and further improvements are needed both in law and in practice. The Committee further notes that, according to the 2007 report on findings on the worst forms of child labour in Egypt on the High Commissioner for Refugees web site (www.unhcr.org), children work in a number of other hazardous sectors, including fishing, glassworks, blacksmithing, working metal and copper, construction, carpentry, mining and quarrying. Once again expressing serious concern at the situation of children working in Egypt, the Committee urges the Government to redouble its efforts to combat child labour. It also requests the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, including statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, extracts of inspection reports, as well as the number and nature of contraventions reported and penalties imposed.

El Salvador

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indication by the Inter-Union Commission of El Salvador that children between 12 and 14 years of age are engaged in work in El Salvador and that the Government has not implemented a plan of action for the elimination of child labour. It also noted the indication by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), that child labour is very widespread in unregulated rural and urban economies. The Committee noted the Government's indication that activities have been carried out in collaboration with ILO-IPEC. It also noted the numerous projects implemented in the context of the Time-bound Programme (TBP) on the worst forms of child labour, and the results achieved. It further noted that, according to the statistics contained in a study conducted in 2005 in households in the country (EHPM), the number of children between the ages of 5 and 17 years who were engaged in work had fallen from 222,475 in 2001 to 207,460 in 2005.

The Committee notes with interest the information provided by the Government on the results of the implementation of Phase I of the TBP between September 2001 and September 2006. In total, 42,770 children benefitted from this phase of the TBP. Of this number, 12,967 children were removed from child labour and 29,803 were prevented from working. These children also benefitted from various services, including formal and non-formal schooling and vocational training, and their parents had access, among other measures, to income-generating activities. Phase II of the TBP commenced in October 2006. The objective of the second Phase is to implement programmes of action to eliminate child labour, including its worst forms, among other areas, in the sugar cane and fishing industries and hazardous types of work in markets. The Committee notes with interest that between October 2006 and August 2008, over 5,054 children benefitted from Phase II of the TBP. Of these, 3,754 children were prevented from being engaged in work and 1,300 children were removed from their work.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that labour inspections carried out between August 2006 and June 2008 resulted in the removal of over 200 children from their work and the assurance that the children did not return to work. It also notes the statistics provided by the Government on a survey carried out by the General Directorate of Statistics and Census in 2006, according to which 205,009 children between the ages of 5 and 17 years were engaged in work. Of this number, 24,818 children were between the ages of 5 and 11 years and 108,191 were between 12 and 17 years of age. According to the survey, the great majority of children were engaged in work in rural areas and in unpaid activities: 132,015 children between the ages of 5 and 17 years worked in rural areas in agriculture and commerce, with 72,994 children working in urban areas, in manufacturing and commerce.

The Committee notes that the Government is participating in the ILO–IPEC project on the elimination of child labour in Latin America (third phase). It also notes that in August 2007 the Government signed a tripartite agreement for the adoption of the Decent Work Country Programme, which takes into account child labour. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that a preliminary draft text of a Bill for the comprehensive protection of children and young persons is currently under discussion in the Presidential Chamber and that it will then be submitted to the Legislative Assembly. It contains a chapter entirely devoted to child labour.

The Committee notes that, according to the statistics referred to above, the number of working children fell from 207,460 in 2005 to 205,009 in 2006. The Committee appreciates the measures taken by the Government for the abolition of child labour and considers these measures as an affirmation of its political will to develop strategies to combat the problem. However, it expresses concern at the persistence of child labour in practice. The Committee therefore strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to improve the situation and requests it to provide information on the measures adopted, in the context of the implementation of Phase II of the TBP, the ILO–IPEC project for the elimination of child labour in Latin America and the Decent Work Country Programme, for the abolition of child labour in practice. It asks the Government to provide information on the results achieved. Furthermore, the Committee invites it to continue providing detailed information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice including, for example, statistical data disaggregated by sex on the nature, extent and scope of work by children and young persons under the minimum age specified by the Government when ratifying the Convention and extracts from the reports of the inspection services.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the ITUC’s indication that, although education is compulsory and free of charge up to the age of 14 years in El Salvador, additional fees have to be paid, which prevent children from poor families from attending school. In this respect, it noted the many educational programmes implemented by the Ministry of Education in the context of Plan 2021, the object of which is to facilitate the access to education of the greatest possible number of children. Furthermore, the Committee noted that, according to statistics on the school attendance rate of children between 5 and 17 years of age in 2003, the percentage of children who work is increasing when only rural areas are taken into account. Indeed, while the percentage of registrations is balanced, with 50 per cent in rural areas and 50 per cent urban areas, 76.2 per cent of children at school who also work are in rural areas. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the implementation of the educational programmes decided upon in the context of Plan 2021.

The Committee notes with interest the detailed information provided by the Government on the programmes of action implemented by the Ministry of Education in the context of Plan 2021. It notes that various measures have been adopted under these programmes to improve the quality of education and increase school attendance rates, particularly for marginalized children or those from very poor families in rural and urban areas. Measures have also been taken to promote equality of opportunity in access to education, not only between the sexes, but also for those who require specialized education or who have a disability. According to the Government, these programmes benefitted over 1,857,246 students in 2007.

The Committee notes that, according to the Global Monitoring Report 2008 on Education for All, published by UNESCO and entitled “Education for All by 2015: Will we make it?”, the country has a high chance of achieving the goal of universal primary education for all by 2015. Furthermore, if progress is regular, gender parity in both primary and secondary education is likely to be achieved. The Committee further notes that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2006, the gross primary school enrolment rate is 93 per cent for both girls and boys, while the rates for secondary school are 54 per cent for girls and 52 per cent for boys.

The Committee takes due note of the gross enrolment rate for primary school and the fact that the country has a high chance of achieving by 2015 the goal of universal primary education for all and of gender parity. However, it expresses concern at the gross enrolment rate for secondary school, which is fairly low. It observes that poverty is one of the primary causes of child labour and, when combined with a deficient educational system, prevents the development of children. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee strongly requests the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the operation of the education system in the country and to take measures to allow children to attend compulsory basic education or to join an informal school system. In this respect, it asks the Government to continue providing information on the measures adopted in the context of Plan

2021 to increase the enrolment rate, particularly for secondary education, so as to prevent children under 14 years of age from working. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the results achieved.

The Committee is also raising another matter in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Article 3, clauses (a) and (b), of the Convention and Part III of the report form. Sale and trafficking of children for sexual exploitation, and court decisions. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indication from the Inter-Union Commission of El Salvador (CATS–CTD–CGT–CTS–CSTS–CUTS), to the effect that ever increasing numbers of boys and girls are being sexually exploited in El Salvador. It also noted that, according to the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the trafficking of people for sexual exploitation, particularly in forced prostitution rings involving children, is a serious problem in the country, with child victims of trafficking for prostitution coming from Mexico, Guatemala and other countries in the region. Moreover, the ITUC indicated that an internal trafficking network exists. The Committee also noted the amendments made to sections 169, 170 and 367-B of the Penal Code and the drawing up of a preliminary draft Act on migration and the status of foreigners.

The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government to the effect that the preliminary draft Act on migration and the status of foreigners is currently the subject of consultation and revision by a commission composed of public institutions including the Ministry of External Relations, the Ministry of Economic Affairs and the Legal Department of the Presidency. Once this procedure has been completed, the preliminary draft Act will be presented to the Legislative Assembly for approval and promulgation. The Committee notes with interest the detailed information supplied by the Government on the investigations conducted into the sale and trafficking of persons, particularly children. It notes in particular the statistics on penalties imposed for the sale and trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation between August 2006 and December 2007. A total of 136 investigations have been conducted by the police forces. Of these, 58 cases are being examined by the courts; 43 cases are still under investigation; and 35 persons have been convicted. The Committee notes the Government's statement that persons found guilty of the sale and trafficking of children for sexual exploitation have been sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from 14 to 26 years. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts to ensure in practice the protection of children under 18 years of age against sale and trafficking for sexual exploitation. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the application of the new provisions of the Penal Code in practice. In particular, in view of the information to the effect that persons have been prosecuted under these new provisions, the Committee requests the Government to supply copies of any court decisions issued under these provisions in its next report. Finally, it requests the Government to supply a copy of the Act on migration and the status of foreigners once it has been adopted.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government to the effect that the Department of Investigations into the Trafficking of Persons, which forms part of the Border Division of the civilian national police, has been strengthened in order to ensure better coverage of the country in the fight against crimes connected with commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee also notes that, according to information contained in the September 2008 report on the ILO–IPEC project entitled “Stop the exploitation. Contribution to the prevention and elimination of commercial sexual exploitation of children in Central America, Panama and the Dominican Republic” (ILO–IPEC project on the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children), the Office of the Chief Public Prosecutor has been provided with training relating to commercial sexual exploitation and trafficking to this end.

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. Sale and trafficking. The Committee notes that, according to the information contained in the September 2008 report on the ILO–IPEC project on the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children, a national plan against the trafficking of persons was approved in August 2008. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the implementation of this national plan, particularly by indicating the programmes of action to be adopted as part of this plan to eliminate the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age for sexual exploitation. It also requests the Government to send a copy of the plan to the Office.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and removing them from the worst forms of child labour. Commercial sexual exploitation. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest that phase II of the Time-bound Programme (TBP), which started in October 2006 and will end in September 2009, aims to support and consolidate the measures taken and the results achieved during phase I of the TBP. The Committee duly notes the Government's indication that, between October 2006 and August 2008, more than 5,054 children benefited from phase II of the TBP, including 400 children who were prevented from becoming victims of commercial sexual exploitation. It also duly notes the detailed information supplied by the Government on the measures taken in the context of the “Strategic plan on commercial sexual exploitation (2006–09)”. Moreover, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the objective in 2008 is to prevent the engagement of some 200 children in, or remove them from, commercial sexual exploitation.

The Committee also notes that, according to the information contained in the September 2008 ILO–IPEC report on the implementation of phase II of the TBP, the Institute for the Development of Children and Young Persons (ISNA) is responsible for providing accommodation for victims of trafficking. To date, the ISNA has the capacity to host 15 persons. As regards the victims of commercial sexual exploitation, these are admitted to the Centre for the Immediate Protection of Children (CIPI) and are then transferred to other ISNA reception centres. The Committee duly notes the measures taken by the Government to prevent the sale and trafficking of children and to remove them from this worst form of child labour, measures which it considers to be an expression of its political will to eliminate the latter. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts and requests it to provide information on the time-bound measures taken as part of the implementation of phase II of the TBP and the “Strategic plan on commercial sexual exploitation (2006–09)” to: (a) prevent children from becoming victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking to this end; and (b) provide necessary and appropriate direct aid to remove children from these worst forms of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the reception centres established by the ISNA and the CIPI, particularly regarding the measures taken in the context of these centres to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of child victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking to this end.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indication from the CATS–CTD–CGT–CTS–CSTS–CUTS to the effect that ever-increasing numbers of boys and girls were becoming victims of hazardous working conditions. It also indicated that the practice of “handing over” boys and girls to families still exists in the country. These children are then used as domestic servants and work long hours without adequate remuneration and without attending school. The Committee took note of a rapid assessment study on domestic work done by children published by ILO–IPEC in February 2002, according to which 93.6 per cent of children working in domestic service are girls.

The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government on the measures taken by the National Committee on the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour and the National Committee on the Trafficking of Persons to protect children against the various forms of abuse. The Committee notes the public awareness campaigns which have been undertaken relating to commercial sexual exploitation and the sale and trafficking of persons. The Committee further notes that these measures do not relate to child domestic workers in El Salvador. Noting once again that children employed in domestic work are often the victims of exploitation, which occurs in a wide variety of forms, the Committee urges the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to protect these children from the worst forms of child labour. It also requests the Government to supply information on the results achieved in this respect.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. Poverty reduction. The Committee noted the “Solidarity network” programme aimed at significantly reducing poverty among 100,000 families spread over the 100 poorest municipalities in the country. It requested the Government to provide information on the results achieved from the implementation of the programme. The Committee duly notes the detailed information provided by the Government on the measures taken in the context of the “Solidarity network” programme to reduce poverty. It notes in particular that, between October 2005 and December 2007, 48,659 families living in 47 poor or extremely poor municipalities in the country benefited from the programme. For 2008, the programme will be implemented in 77 poor or extremely poor municipalities. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts and requests it to provide information on the measures taken as part of the implementation of the “Solidarity network” programme, particularly as regards the effective reduction of poverty among child victims of commercial sexual exploitation or of trafficking to this end.

The Committee is also raising a number of other points in a direct request to the Government.

Gabon

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report. It also notes the information provided by it in June 2007 at the 96th Session of the Committee on the Application of Standards, as well as the discussion which took place on that occasion.

Article 3, clause (a), of the Convention and Part III of the report form. Sale and trafficking of children and court decisions. In response to previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government has brought its legislation in respect of the sale and trafficking of children into line with the Convention. The Committee notes however that, according to the information contained in a UNICEF report of 2006 entitled “Trafficking in human beings, in particular women and children, in West and Central Africa”, a number of children, particularly girls, are victims of internal and cross-border trafficking, to work as domestic workers or in the country’s markets. Children from Benin, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Guinea, Niger, Nigeria and Togo are victims of trafficking to Gabon. Beninese children sent to Gabon mainly come from the departments of Ouémé, Mono, Atlantique and Zou. According to the UNICEF report, in the border regions of Gabon, Cameroon and Equatorial Guinea, the exchange of goods and the free movement of persons of certain ethnic identities, particularly the Fang, who do not require a visa to cross the border, facilitate trafficking.

The Committee notes that despite the declaration by the Government representative made in the Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007 that there is no internal trafficking of children on the national territory, it emerged from the discussion that took place within this Committee that children are victims of both internal and cross-border trafficking in the country. The Committee notes that, in its conclusions of June 2007, the Committee on the Application of Standards requested the Government to ensure that persons who infringe the Convention are prosecuted and face sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions. In the regard, the Committee duly notes the Government's indication that there are 11 judicial proceedings pending, most of which have been referred to the Public Prosecutor's Office.

The Committee notes that, although the legislation is in conformity with the Convention on this matter, the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age for labour exploitation exists in the country. Referring to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards, the Committee urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure, in practice, the protection of children under 18 years of age against the sale and trafficking of children, including by ensuring thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of offenders and that effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions are imposed. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on the application of the provisions concerning the sale and trafficking of children for labour exploitation in practice by providing, in particular, statistics on the convictions and penal sanctions imposed. Furthermore, taking into account the information that judicial proceedings are pending, some of which have been referred to the Public Prosecutor's Office, the Committee requests the Government to provide the court rulings handed down.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. 1. Council to Prevent and Combat the Trafficking of Children. The Committee previously noted the establishment of a Council to Prevent and Combat the Trafficking of Children, an administrative body dedicated to preventing and combating the trafficking of children. It also noted that the Council is responsible in particular for detecting cases of trafficking of children, identifying victims, removing the victims from their situation of exploitation and protecting their rights, and strengthening the action of the follow-up committee in the province. The Committee requested the Government to continue providing information on the work of the Council.

The Committee notes from the discussion which took place in the Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007 that questions remained with regard to the functioning of the Council and that information on its effectiveness was requested by members of that Committee. On that occasion, the Government representative indicated that the Council was not yet functioning. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report that vigilance committees for the prevention and combating of the trafficking of children, which are regional structures, oversee the phenomenon of trafficking in the interior of the country and take responsibility for the child victims. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the functioning of the Council and the vigilance committees, in particular with respect to the number of child victims of trafficking who have been rehabilitated and integrated into society.

2. Labour inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under Decree No. 007141/PR/MTE/MEFBP of 22 September 2005 (Decree No. 007141 of 22 September 2005), a labour inspector may impose penalties directly in the case of offences relating to the trafficking of children. The Committee notes that, in its conclusions of June 2007, the Committee on the Application of Standards requested the Government to expand the authority of the labour inspection services in enforcing the law and to increase their human and financial resources. The Committee on the Application of Standards also requested the Government to ensure that regular visits were carried out by the labour inspectorate. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that a draft text is currently being examined with a view to the effective implementation of Decree No. 007141 of 22 September 2005. This draft text provides for the creation of a special inspectorate responsible for combating child labour. Referring to its observation made under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Committee expresses the firm hope that the draft text which is in the process of being examined will give effect to the recommendation of the Committee on the Application of Standards and will equip the special inspectorate responsible for combating child labour, with the means to enable it to enforce effectively the national legislation on the sale and trafficking of children. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments relating to the adoption of the draft text.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. The Committee notes with interest the document on the results of the Government's action to combat the trafficking of children, which contains detailed information on the measures taken in the context of the subregional project on combating the trafficking in children for labour exploitation in West and Central Africa (IPEC/LUTRENA), the activities of which were completed in 2007.

Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. 1. Access to free basic education. The Committee notes that, in its conclusions of June 2007, the Committee on the Application of Standards underlined the importance of free, universal and compulsory formal education in preventing the worst forms of child labour, and invited the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure access to free basic education for both boys and girls. In this regard, the Committee notes that, according to the UNICEF statistics from 2006, the net school attendance at the primary level is 94 per cent for girls and boys and, at the secondary level, 36 per cent for girls and 34 per cent for boys. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, according to the Education for All Global Monitoring Report of 2008, published by UNESCO and entitled Education for All by 2015: Will we make it?, at least 20 per cent of the country's primary school pupils are repeating or have repeated a year and the figure rises to more than 30 per cent for the first year of primary school.

The Committee takes note of the net school attendance rate at the primary level. However, it expresses concern at the rather low net school attendance rate at the secondary level and at the high level of repetition among pupils at the primary level. Considering that education contributes to preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, and referring to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards of June 2007, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system in the country. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on the time-bound measures taken to increase school attendance, particularly at the secondary level, and to reduce the repetition rate at the primary level. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved.

2. Awareness-raising activities. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes the indication of the Government's representative of June 2007 to the effect that a free hotline has been set up. Furthermore, it takes due note of the information provided by the Government that, in the context of combating the worst forms of child labour, awareness-raising campaigns have been organized with NGOs and a number of workers' organizations in order to explain to society the gravity of the phenomenon of the trafficking of children and its immorality, the traumatic consequences of this scourge on children and the penalties incurred by persons engaged in trafficking or all those who exploit minors. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to prevent children from becoming victims of trafficking for labour exploitation and requests it to provide information on the results achieved in this regard.

Clause (b). Assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour. Reception centre and medical and social assistance for child victims of trafficking. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 5 of Act No. 09/2004 of 21 September 2004 provides for the establishment of specific medical and social assistance for children who are victims of trafficking and for the establishment of reception centres for child victims of trafficking before their repatriation to their country of origin. It also noted that a national manual of procedures for dealing with child victims of trafficking has been prepared.

The Committee notes with interest the information provided by the Government's representative to the Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007 to the effect that, during the period 2003–05, 200 individuals who had been victims of trafficking were removed from this worst form of child labour, of whom 137 were children aged between 5 and 16 years. Of these 137 children, 115 were girls, who are the most affected by the phenomena of trafficking and exploitation. Furthermore, two-thirds of these children have been reintegrated into their country of origin and the others in Gabon.

The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government in its report that the country has four reception centres, three in Libreville and one in Port-Gentil. Children removed from a situation of exploitation receive an initial medical visit a few days after their placement in a centre. Children who are ill are taken care of by doctors and, if necessary, hospitalized. Furthermore, with a view to their rehabilitation and social integration, children are supervised by specialist teachers and psychologists and benefit from social and educational activity programmes and administrative and legal support in association with the follow-up committee and vigilance committees. The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government that children removed from trafficking are, during their stay in the centres, according to their age, enrolled free of charge in public schools in which they benefit from the same advantages as other children. Those who have passed school age are enrolled in literacy centres. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that the national manual of procedures for dealing with child victims of trafficking has been adopted. It develops a four-stage process: (a) identification of the victim; (b) removal; (c) administrative action and psychosocial care; and (d) restoration, accommodation and return to the country of origin or reintegration into Gabon.

The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the time-bound measures taken to remove child victims of sale and trafficking, in particular, the number of children who have actually been removed from this worst form of labour. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken in the context of the national manual on procedures for dealing with child victims of trafficking to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration.

Article 8. International cooperation. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee emphasizes that it emerged from the discussion which took place within the Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007 that it is necessary for the Government to continue its cooperation with neighbouring countries to combat the trafficking of children. Moreover, the Government representative indicated on that occasion that the possibility of taking measures to increase the number of police officers at land, maritime and aerial borders, setting up joint border patrols and opening transit centres of neighbouring countries was being envisaged.

The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government that, in July 2006, it signed the Multilateral Cooperation Agreement to Combat Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children in West and Central Africa. It also notes the Government's statement that it is negotiating a bilateral agreement with Benin regard to the trafficking of children. However, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it has not given full effect to the matters of increasing the number of police officers at land, maritime and aerial borders, setting up joint border controls and establishing transit centres of neighbouring countries. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to give effect to the Multilateral Cooperation Agreement to Combat Trafficking in Persons. Furthermore, the Committee expresses the hope that the bilateral agreement with Benin on the trafficking of children will be signed in the near future and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard. Finally, the Committee expresses the firm hope that, under these two agreements, measures will be taken to increase the number of police officers at land, maritime and aerial borders, in particular through the establishment of joint patrols at borders and the opening of transit centres of neighbouring countries.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee emphasizes that, in its observation of 2004, it noted the statistics included in the additional information attached to the Government's initial report submitted to the Committee on the Rights of the Child in 2002 (GAB/1, page 12). According to these statistics, 25,000 children were working in Gabon, of whom between 17,000 and 20,000 were victims of trafficking. The Committee notes that, during the discussion which took place within the Committee on the Application of Standards in 2007, it was emphasized that there was a lack of recent statistical data on the trafficking of children in the country. In this regard, the Government representative indicated that the Government intended to carry out an analysis of the national situation concerning child trafficking in Gabon and a mapping of the trafficking routes and zones in which forced labour involving children was practised. The Committee notes that, in its conclusions of 2007, the Committee on the Application of Standards urged the Government to undertake a national study on child labour to assess the extent of the worst forms of child labour in the country. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will carry out this analysis of the national situation concerning child trafficking in Gabon as soon as possible and requests the Government to provide information on this matter.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Georgia

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee had previously noted the communication of the Georgian Trade Unions Confederation (GTUC) dated 30 August 2006. The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the issues raised by the GTUC.

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention and Part V, of the report form. 1. Minimum age for admission to employment and application of the Convention in practice. In its communication, the GTUC had stated that according to UNICEF estimates, 30 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 15 years work in Georgia and that there were reports of children between the ages of 7 and 12 years working on the streets of Tbilisi, in markets, carrying or loading wares, selling goods in underground carriages, railway stations, etc. Moreover, based on the information provided by the trade union of agricultural workers, the GTUC alleged that child labour is widespread in the agricultural sector at harvest time in several regions of Georgia.

In its replies, the Government states that in order to clarify the above allegations made by the GTUC, the Government had requested the GTUC to provide the documentation of the respective sources, including UNICEF statistical data and the information regarding child labour in the agricultural sector in the specially noted regions. But, unfortunately, the GTUC was unable to produce such data and just named a few organizations who conducted studies in 2000, 2003 and 2004. Moreover, the data prepared by UNICEF, which is available on its web site does not include the aforementioned statistics. The Government therefore states that the above allegations by the GTUC were based on unverified sources. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that, in the near future, UNICEF plans to conduct a study on street children which would possibly help the Government to evaluate the actual situation and to plan for specific measures.

The Committee, nevertheless, notes that according to the Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey (MICS), UNICEF 2005 (page 51) more than 18 per cent of the children aged 5–14 years were involved in child labour, mainly unpaid and working for a family business. The number of children involved in child labour varied in different regions, ranging from 12.8 per cent in Samegrelo-Zemo Svaneti to 26.1 per cent in Guria. The corresponding estimate from the MICS of 1999 was 30 per cent, implying an important drop in the percentage of children involved in labour. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that no child under the age of 15 years performs child labour in any sector of economic activity. It also requests the Government to provide recent statistical information on the employment of children and young persons, in particular children working on the streets and in the agricultural sector.

2. Scope of application. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that self-employment is not regulated by the legislation of Georgia. The Committee had, therefore, requested the Government to provide information on the manner in which the protection afforded by the Convention is secured for children who work in the agricultural sector, as well as those working on their own account. The Committee notes the Government's information that, according to section 4(2) of the Labour Code, the labour capacity of children below 16 years shall only be permitted in the case of consent from his/her legal representative, tutor or guardian, if it is not against his/her interests, does not damage his/her moral, physical or mental development and does not limit his/her right and ability to obtain elementary, compulsory and basic education. Consequently, a child between 14 and 16 years can be employed in different sectors, including agriculture, but subject to the above conditions. The Committee further notes the Government's information that, according to the Department of Statistics of Georgia, 95 per cent of employees in agriculture are engaged in small-scale farms and household cultivated lands of up to 1 hectare and do not use hired labour. The Government, therefore, states that children's work, if any, is not hired work and their work in the abovementioned family holdings cannot be considered as incompatible with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee reminds the Government that, by virtue of the minimum age specified by it, children under 15 years of age shall not be permitted to work, regardless of the type of work performed, and whether it is paid or not, with the exception of light work, which can only be carried out under the conditions laid down in Article 7 of the Convention. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children working in the agricultural sector, as well as those working on their own account, are entitled to the protection afforded by the Convention. It also requests the Government to take measures to adapt and strengthen the labour inspection services, in order to ensure that the protection established by the Convention is applied to all self-employed children.

Article 3, paragraph 1. Age of admission to hazardous work. The Committee had previously noted that, according to section 4(5) of the Labour Code of 2006, it is prohibited to conclude a contract with under age persons for hard, unhealthy and hazardous work. It had also noted section 4(4) of the Labour Code, which prohibits under age persons from entering into a contract for work related to the gambling business, in night entertainment institutions, pornography production and the production and conveyance of pharmaceutical and toxic substances. The Committee had requested the Government to indicate the legal provisions which defines under age persons as persons under the age of 18 years. The Committee notes with interest the Government's information that, according to section 12 of the Civil Code of Georgia, a minor is a person under the age of 18 years. The Government further states that the Labour Code does not provide for a definition different from that of the Civil Code of Georgia.

Article 3, paragraph 2. Determination of hazardous work. The Committee had previously noted that, under the new Labour Code, a draft list of hard, harmful and hazardous work has been elaborated and sent to the employees' and employers' organizations for approval. The Committee notes with satisfaction the Government's information that the Minister of Labour, Health and Social Affairs adopted Order No. 147/N, 3 May 2007 which provides for a list of heavy, hazardous and harmful works. The Committee requests the Government to supply a copy of the above Order No. 147/N along with its next report.

Article 7, paragraphs 1 and 3. Light work and determination of light work. The Committee had previously noted the comments by the GTUC that the hours of work of young workers are not limited. As per section 14 of the Labour Code, if parties do not agree otherwise, a working week shall not exceed 41 hours, which is also applicable to young workers. The Committee notes the Government's reference to section 18 of the Labour Code which prohibits night work (10 p.m. to 6 a.m.) by young persons and section 4(2) which lays down the conditions of employment of children between 14 and 16 years. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that a child can be employed in different sectors, including agriculture, but subject to the conditions under section 4(2) of the Labour Code. The Committee observes, however, that the Labour Code does not contain provisions which prescribe the number of working hours during which young persons may work. The Committee once again recalls that, according to Article 7, paragraph 3, of the Convention, the competent authority shall determine the activities in which employment or work may be permitted and shall prescribe the number of hours during which such employment or work may be undertaken. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to take the necessary measures to determine light work activities and to prescribe the number of hours during which light work may be undertaken by young persons of 14 years of age and above, in conformity with the Convention.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning certain other points.

Guatemala

Article 2, paragraphs 1 and 4, of the Convention and Part V of the report form. Minimum age for admission to employment or work and application in practice. The Committee had previously noted that, according to the study entitled "Understanding child labour in Guatemala", carried out in 2000 by the National Statistical Institute, around 507,000 boys and girls aged between 7 and 14 years were engaged in work in Guatemala. The agricultural sector was the branch of economic activity with the most child workers (62 per cent), followed by commerce (16.1 per cent), manufacturing (10.7 per cent), services (6.1 per cent), and construction (3.1 per cent). The Committee noted that the Labour Code and the Act on the Integral Protection of Children and Young Persons of 2003 banned work by children under 14 years of age in any activity, including the informal economy. The Committee also noted the adoption of Government Agreement No. 112-2006 of 7 March 2006 issuing Regulations on the Protection of Children and Young Persons at Work (Regulations on the Protection of Children and Young Persons at Work) which bans work for children under 14 years of age and contains provisions on the protection of children and young people involved in an economic activity. It requested the Government to provide detailed information on the way in which the Convention is applied in practice, by providing in particular statistics on the nature, extent and trends of the employment of children under the specified minimum age.

In its report, the Government points out that the Special Labour Inspectors Unit under the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare formulated a project, in 2006, with a view to monitoring the application of the provisions contained in the Labour Code and the Act on the Integral Protection of Children and Young Persons of 2003. The Committee also notes that, according to the Government, a public policy for the full protection of children and young persons as well as an Action Plan on Children and Young Persons (2004–15) have been adopted. While noting this information, the Committee observes that the Government's report does not contain any statistics on the nature, extent and trends of child labour in the country. In this respect, it notes that, according to an ILO-IPEC report of June 2008 entitled "Elimination of child labour in Latin America. Third stage", a study on the living conditions in Guatemala was carried out in 2006.

Given the statistics mentioned above, the Committee states once again that it is very concerned about the number of children under 14 years of age obliged to work and urges the Government to step up its efforts to improve this situation. In this respect, it requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken, especially in the context of the implementation of the public policy for the full protection of children and young persons and the Action Plan on Children and Young Persons (2004–15), with a view to eliminating child labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results obtained. Finally, it requests the Government to provide a copy of the study on the living conditions in Guatemala, which was carried out in 2006.

Article 3, paragraph 2. Determination of hazardous types of work. Production and handling of explosive substances and objects. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indication by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, now called the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), that child workers were engaged in extremely dangerous activities, such as the production of fireworks and in stone quarries. The ITUC pointed out that work in the fireworks industry was particularly dangerous and that children were often seriously injured. The Committee noted that the list of types of hazardous work determined by the Government included the fireworks industry and construction, including activities which entailed working with stone. The Committee took note of the measures taken by the Government to combat child labour in the fireworks industry, especially the adoption of Government Agreement No. 28-2004 of 12 January 2004 issuing regulations on firework production. The Committee noted that section 7(a) of the Government Agreement No. 250-2006 issuing regulations on the application of Convention No. 182 of the International Labour Organization on the worst forms of child labour and immediate action for their elimination (Regulation on the application of Convention No. 182) prohibited work by persons under 18 years of age in the manufacture, layout and handling of explosive substances or objects and the production of explosives or fireworks. It also noted that section 4(b) and (c) of the Regulation applied to employers and parents who used young persons under 18 years of age in any of the prohibited activities; furthermore, section 5 stipulated that such persons should be held responsible and liable to penalties. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the implementation of the Regulation on the application of Convention No. 182 in practice.

In its report, the Government points out that the Department on Training in Labour Matters, under the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, has conducted information and awareness-raising workshops on the hazards of the fireworks industry, especially for children, in more than 69 small enterprises and for the families of workers employed in these enterprises. It also mentions that labour inspectors have carried out 28 visits to factories manufacturing fireworks. Furthermore, the Ministry of Education had introduced a programme of grants entitled "Grants for peace", to ensure that no person under 18 years of age should be employed in the fireworks sector and in public refuse dumps. According to the Government, 4,320 grants were awarded to students from 21 schools. The Committee takes due note of the efforts made by the Government to end the employment of children under 18 years of age in this dangerous activity. It notes, however, that the Government's report does not contain any information on the results obtained when it visited the 28 factories manufacturing fireworks. It therefore requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the Regulation on the application of Convention No. 182 in practice, by giving details on the inspections carried out by the labour inspectors in the factories manufacturing fireworks, submitting extracts from the reports of the inspection services, and specifying the number and nature of violations recorded and the penalties applied.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Article 3, paragraph (a), of the Convention and Part III of the report form. Sale and trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation and court decisions. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), reporting the problem of trafficking of persons for prostitution in Guatemala, of whom the majority of child victims were from neighbouring countries and particularly from the border regions with Mexico and El Salvador. The Committee also noted the comments made by the Trade Union Confederation of Guatemala (UNSTRAGUA) according to which many girls and boys who are victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation are from neighbouring countries. Finally, it noted that section 194 of the Penal Code prohibits the trafficking of persons, including minors, for exploitation, prostitution, pornography or any other form of sexual exploitation.

The Committee notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations on the Government's initial report on the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography of July 2007 (CRC/C/OPSC/GTM/CO/1, paragraphs 8, 12 and 22) expressed concern at the increasing incidence of commercial sexual exploitation of children and the high number of victims in the country, estimated by the Government at 15,000 victims. The Committee on the Rights of the Child also noted reports that child victims are penalized and institutionalized during prolonged periods awaiting decisions in their cases. The Committee also notes that, according to a Trafficking in Persons Report of 2008, available on the UNHCR web site (www.unhcr.org), trafficking in persons is a significant and growing problem in the country. Guatemala is a source, transit and destination country. According to this report, Guatemalan children are victims of internal trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation or cross-border trafficking to Mexico or the United States for the same purpose. Furthermore, the border areas with Mexico and Belize remain a top concern due to the heavy flow of undocumented migrants, many of whom fall victims to traffickers. The report also indicates that Guatemala is a destination country for victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation from El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua.

In its report, the Government indicates that, since November 2007, the Trafficking in Persons Unit has conducted a number of investigations relating to commercial sexual exploitation. These investigations have led to 37 prosecutions for trafficking in persons. The Committee also notes that, according to the information contained in the ILO-IPEC report of September 2008 on the regional project entitled "Stopping exploitation: Contribution to the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children in Central America, Panama and the Dominican Republic" (the project on the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children), an initiative for the adoption of a law against violence, exploitation and trafficking for the purposes of sexual exploitation was submitted to the Congress of the Republic in August 2008. Furthermore, according to the information contained in the ILO-IPEC report of September 2008, one person has been sentenced for the trafficking of children and 16 cases are in the process of being investigated. Finally, according to this report, the reform of the Penal Code is still under way.

The Committee notes the measures taken by the Government, particularly those of a legislative nature, against the sale and trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation. However, it is very concerned that concordant information from various sources confirm the persistence of the problem in the country, which seems to be of considerable magnitude. The Committee also expresses concern at the practice which exists of punishing child victims of trafficking or institutionalizing them for long periods. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure the protection of children under 18 years of age against sale and trafficking for sexual exploitation. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the provisions of the Penal Code prohibiting the sale and trafficking of children for sexual exploitation, by providing, in particular, statistics on convictions and the penal sanctions imposed. Furthermore, taking into account the information that investigations are conducted and individuals are prosecuted, the Committee requests the Government to provide the court decisions handed down. Finally, it requests the Government to provide a copy of the law against violence, exploitation and trafficking for sexual purposes and of the amended Penal Code as soon as they have been adopted.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. The Committee takes due note that, according to the information contained in the ILO-IPEC report of September 2008 on the project to prevent and eliminate the commercial sexual exploitation of children, awareness-raising and training activities on commercial sexual exploitation and the sale and trafficking to that end have been organized for judges, local authorities and police forces.

Article 6. Programmes of action. National Plan of Action to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, according to the information contained in the ILO-IPEC report of September 2008 on the project on the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children, the National Plan of Action to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children is to be revised. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the new Plan of Action and information on the programmes of action which will be adopted in the context of its implementation.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. The Committee notes that, according to the information contained in the ILO-IPEC report of September 2008 on the project on the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children, of the total of 2,573 children who have benefitted from the project in the participating countries, 1,409 have been prevented from becoming victims of trafficking or commercial sexual exploitation and 1,164 have been removed from this worst form of child labour.

Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from these forms of labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. 1. Regional project on the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest that, according to the information contained in the ILO-IPEC report of September 2008 on the project for the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children, between March and April 2008, of a total of 84 children who benefitted from the project, 30 were prevented from becoming victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking to that end and 54 were removed from these worst forms of labour. The Committee also notes that these children have either been reintegrated into the formal or informal school system or have received other training.

The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government that a public policy against the trafficking of persons and for the full protection of the victims and a National Plan of Strategic Action (2007-17) were adopted in 2007. According to the Government, this public policy and the National Plan aim to provide for immediate and full protection of the victims, namely medical and psychological care and reintegration into the family and society. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the time-bound measures taken in the context of the implementation of the ILO-IPEC regional project for the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children and on the results achieved to: (a) prevent children from becoming victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for that purpose; and (b) provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance to remove the child victims from these worst forms of child labour. With regard to the public policy against the trafficking of persons and for the full protection of the victims and the National Plan of Strategic Action (2007-17), the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the specific time-bound measures taken in the context of their implementation, to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of the child victims removed from these worst forms of labour.

2. Tourist activities. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the measures taken to raise the awareness of the actors directly involved in the tourist industry. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Guatemalan Institute of Tourism (INGUAT) has undertaken to promote, at the national scale, a process of training and awareness raising of the tourist industry for the years 2007–10 to prevent the formation of trafficking networks, particularly for commercial sexual exploitation, and to detect their activities. It also notes the Government's indication that the Global Code of Ethics for Tourism is promoted in the country and, in 2008, a plan of action to implement the Code of Conduct for the tourism sector for the protection of children against commercial sexual exploitation will be devised. The Committee takes due note of the measures taken by the Government to raise the awareness of the actors directly involved in the tourist industry and urges it to continue its efforts in that regard.

Article 8. International cooperation. Trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee previously noted that, in the context of the implementation of the public policy and National Plan of Action for Childhood (2004–15), the Government planned to adopt measures in collaboration with neighbouring countries with a view to bringing to an end the sale and trafficking of girls, boys and young persons for the purposes of sexual exploitation.

The Committee notes the statistics provided by the Government according to which, for the year 2000, 1,981 children travelling with their parents were recorded in the register of migrant workers of the labour migration office of the village of El Carmen and, between January and July 2008, 1,290 were recorded. It takes due note of the Government's indication that a new labour migration office will open in the town of Tecún Umán. The Committee notes that the National Protocol for the repatriation of boys, girls and young persons who are victims of trafficking was adopted in 2007. Furthermore, a document has been adopted on the regional directives for the special protection for returning boys, girls and young persons who have been victims of trafficking (regional directives for the special protection of returning victims of trafficking), the purpose of which is to promote cooperation between member countries of the Regional Conference on Migration.

The Committee notes, however, that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of July 2007 (CRC/C/OPSC/GTM/CO/1, paragraph 29), while recognizing the existence of relevant memorandums of understanding with neighbouring countries of Guatemala, expressed concern that undocumented foreign children, including victims of trafficking, are subject to deportation and must leave the country within 72 hours. The Committee is also concerned at this situation and expresses the firm hope that the implementation of the National Protocol for the repatriation of boys, girls and young persons who have been victims of trafficking and of the regional directives for the special protection for returning victims of trafficking will allow this situation to be remedied. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of child victims removed from trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation in their country of origin.

Furthermore, the Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Honduras

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1980)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in its concluding observations on the third periodic report by the Government in February 2007, the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern at: the lack of funds allocated for the implementation of the National Plan of Action for the Prevention and Gradual and Progressive Elimination of Child Labour; the large number of children, especially in rural areas and among indigenous peoples, working under exploitative conditions, including children engaged in deep sea fishing in Puerto Lempira; and young persons between 14 and 17 years of age working in mines (CRC/C/HND/CO/3, paragraph 72). The Committee however noted that a new national plan of action for the prevention and gradual and progressive elimination of child labour, which would be closely linked to the worst forms of child labour, was under preparation. It strongly encouraged the Government to redouble its efforts to combat child labour and requested it to provide information on the implementation of the new national plan of action.

The Committee notes that the Government has not provided information in its report. The Committee notes that the Government signed a third Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) with ILO–IPEC in July 2007. Moreover, it notes with interest the information provided by the Government in its report under Convention No. 182 that the National Commission for the Gradual and Progressive Elimination of Child Labour (CNEGTE) has developed a second National Plan of Action for the Gradual and Progressive Elimination of Child Labour in Honduras (2008–15) (National Plan of Action for the Elimination of Child Labour (2008–15)). The objective of this second plan of action is to determine the appropriate measures which governmental institutions, with the participation of civil society and international cooperation, should take to prevent and eliminate child labour. The Committee further notes that, according to an ILO–IPEC report of January 2008 on the project for the “Elimination of Child Labour in Latin America Third Phase” (ILO–IPEC report of January 2008), a programme of action has recently been launched with the objective of contributing to preventing and removing indigenous girls, boys and young persons from child labour. The Committee further notes that the Government signed a tripartite agreement in August 2007 relating to the adoption of the Decent Work Country Programme, which takes child labour into account. However, the Committee notes that, according to the 2006 statistics contained in a CNEGPTTE document on the second National Plan of Action for the Elimination of Child Labour (2008–15), 299,916 girls, boys and young persons aged between 5 and 17 years were economically active. Of this number, 21.51 per cent were girls and 78.49 per cent were boys. Moreover, 72 per cent of the children engaged in work live in rural areas, and 28 per cent in urban areas. Children work principally in agriculture, forestry, fishing and domestic work (56.2 per cent); businesses, hotels and restaurants (24.4 per cent); manufacturing (8.2 per cent); construction (3 per cent); and transport, shops and distribution (1 per cent).

The Committee expresses appreciation of the measures adopted by the Government for the abolition of child labour and considers these measures as an affirmation of its political will to develop strategies to combat the problem. The Committee however expresses concern at the persistence of child labour in practice. It therefore firmly requests the Government to continue its efforts for the abolition of child labour. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures that are taken in the context of the second National Plan of Action for the Elimination of Child Labour (2008–15), and particularly the programmes of action that are implemented, and of the Decent Work Country Programme, with a view to the progressive abolition of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved. The Committee also invites the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice including, for example, statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, extracts from the reports of the inspection services, and particularly inspections in the sectors referred to above.

Article 2, paragraph 1. Scope of application. The Committee has observed previously that it would be necessary to amend section 2(1) of the Labour Code, which excludes from its scope agricultural and stock-raising undertakings that do not permanently employ more than ten workers, so that the minimum age provisions contained in the Labour Code apply to this category of workers. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft revision of the Labour Code contains provisions to bring national labour legislation into conformity with the international Conventions ratified by Honduras, and accordingly to harmonize the provisions of the Labour Code and the Regulations on Child Labour of 2001 with the Code for Children and Young Persons of 1996. This should ensure that the provisions relating to the minimum age for admission to work apply to children working under an employment contract or on their own account. Furthermore, the Committee notes the statistics contained in the national report on child labour in Honduras of 2002, according to which 54.3 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 9 years and 59.8 per cent of those aged between 10 and 14 years worked in agriculture, forestry, hunting and fishing. Furthermore, 6.2 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 17 years worked on their own account in urban areas and 7 per cent in rural areas. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject. Recalling once again that it has been raising this issue for a number of years, and taking into account the worrying statistics referred to above, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the draft revision of the Labour Code will be adopted as soon as possible and that it will contain provisions guaranteeing the protection provided for by the Convention in respect of children working in agricultural and stock-raising undertakings that do not permanently employ more than ten workers. It requests the Government to provide information in this respect. Furthermore, the Committee asks the Government to envisage the possibility of adapting and strengthening the labour inspection services so as to ensure the application of this protection.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in its concluding observations on the Government's third periodic report in February 2007, the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern at the high percentage of children who do not attend school (CRC/C/HND/CO/3, paragraph 72). The Committee notes that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2006, the net school attendance rate in primary education is 80 per cent for girls and 77 per cent for boys, and that the rate for secondary education is 36 per cent for girls and 29 per cent for boys. It also notes the information contained in the ILO–IPEC report of January 2008 that the objectives of the plan for Education for All by 2015 will not be achieved. However, the Committee notes that, according to the ILO–IPEC report of January 2008, a preliminary draft of a General Education Act, to replace the Framework Act of 1966, has been submitted to the Directorate of Education. The new law, among other measures, establishes compulsory and free schooling for ten years, consisting of one year of pre-school and nine years of primary schooling. The Committee further notes that, according to the ILO–IPEC report of January 2008, the programme of action for the elimination of child labour in the fireworks industry directly benefitted 770 girls and boys, who have been integrated into the formal education system.

While noting that the net school attendance rate at the primary level is relatively good, the Committee expresses concern at the fact that the country will not achieve the objectives for Education for All in 2015. It also expresses concern at the low rate of net school attendance at secondary school. It observes that poverty is one of the primary causes of child labour and that, when combined with a defective education system, it hinders the development of children. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee firmly requests the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the operation of the education system in the country and to take measures to enable children to attend compulsory basic education or to be integrated into an informal school system. In this respect, it requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to increase the school attendance rate, at both primary and secondary school, with a view to preventing children under 14 years of age from being engaged in work. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved. Finally, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the General Education Act once it has been adopted.

Article 2, paragraph 4. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee noted previously that under section 120(2) of the Code for Children and Young Persons of 1996, a minor under 14 years of age may not, under any circumstances, be permitted to work. It also noted that under section 32(1) of the Labour Code, young persons under 14 years and those having reached this age who are still engaged in compulsory education are not allowed to work. However, it noted that, under section 32(2) of the Labour Code, the authorities responsible for supervising work by persons under 14 years of age may permit them to work if they consider that it is indispensable to provide for their subsistence or that of their parents or their brothers and sisters, and provided that it does not prevent them from following compulsory schooling. The Committee reminded the Government that, under Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention, no one under the age specified shall be admitted to employment or work in any occupation, subject to the derogations envisaged in Articles 4 to 8 of the Convention. Noting that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject, the Committee once again expresses the firm hope that, in the context of the revision of the Labour Code, the Government will take into account the above comments. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure that no minor under 14 years of age is authorized to work in any sector of economic activity.

Article 3, paragraph 2. Determination of hazardous types of work. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Agreement No. STSS-097-2008 of 12 May 2008 amending section 8 of the Child Labour Regulations and adopting a detailed list of types of hazardous work that are prohibited for persons under 18 years of age. It also notes that this Agreement was adopted in consultation with the organizations of employers and workers. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the Agreement provides that the list of hazardous types of work shall be revised and updated every three years.

Article 3, paragraph 3. Hazardous work from the age of 16 years. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 122(3) of the Code for Children and Young Persons of 1996, young persons between 16 and 18 years of age may be permitted to perform hazardous types of work, as enumerated in the list contained in section 122(2) of the Code, if so approved for this purpose by technical studies undertaken by the National Vocational Training Institute or a specialized technical institute under the responsibility of the Secretariat of State for Public Education. In this respect, the Government indicated that the Department of Labour and Social Security examines the technical studies with a view to certifying that the workloads associated with the tasks in question can be performed by young persons between 16 and 18 years of age and that occupational safety measures are adopted in order to minimize the dangers to their health and safety. The Government added that the use of the term “could” in section 122 of the Code for Children and Young Persons means that a work permit for a young person over 16 years of age may only be granted in cases in which, in the view of the Department of Labour and Social Security, the work would not prejudice the young person. Moreover, for work to be permitted by a young person, the latter must attend school. While taking due note of the information provided by the Government, the Committee recalled that, in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 3, of the Convention, the competent authority may, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, where such exist, authorize employment or work as from the age of 16 years on condition that the health, safety and morals of the young persons concerned are fully protected and that they have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided information on this subject. In view of the fact that, according to the statistics contained in the national report on child labour in the Honduras of 2002, a large number of children still work in hazardous activities, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, where a young person of 16 years of age is permitted to perform hazardous types of work, the conditions set forth in this provision of the Convention are observed. It requests the Government to provide information in this respect and to indicate the number of work permits granted by the Department of Labour and Social Security to young persons between the ages of 16 and 18 years.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Article 3, clauses (a) and (b), of the Convention and Part III of the report form. Sale and trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation, use of children for prostitution or for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances and court decisions. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with satisfaction the adoption of Decree No. 234–2005 of 28 September 2005, reforming the Penal Code. It noted that the new provisions of the Code prohibit: the procuring and the international and internal trafficking of persons for commercial exploitation; the use of young persons under 18 years of age in exhibitions or performances of a sexual nature and in the production of pornography; and the promotion of the country as a tourist destination accessible for sexual activities. The Committee noted, however, that, according to the information contained in the ILO–IPEC reports on the subregional project entitled “Contribution to the prevention and elimination of commercial sexual exploitation of children in Central America, Panama and the Dominican Republic” (the ILO–IPEC subregional project on the commercial sexual exploitation of children), in which Honduras is participating along with Belize, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala and Nicaragua, despite the progress achieved, the problem of the commercial sexual exploitation of young persons under 18 years of age still persists in the country. In this regard, the Committee noted that, in its concluding observations of February 2007 on the Government's third periodic report (document CRC/C/HND/CO/3, paragraph 78), the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern that the commercial sexual exploitation of children is common in Honduras. It asked the Government to provide information on the application of the new provisions in practice.

The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject. It duly notes, however, that, according to a 2007 report on the ILO-IPEC subregional project on the commercial sexual exploitation of children, the new provisions of the Penal Code have been implemented and individuals have been prosecuted. The Committee requests the Government to ensure, in practice, the protection of children under 18 years of age against this worst form of child labour. In this regard, it once again requests the Government to provide information on the application of the new provisions of the Penal Code in practice. Furthermore, taking into account the information that individuals have been prosecuted under these new provisions, the Committee requests the Government to provide the court decisions handed down in accordance with these provisions in its next report.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. The Committee notes with interest that, according to the information contained in the report of March 2007 on the ILO-IPEC subregional project on the commercial sexual exploitation of children, steps have been taken to strengthen the capacities of the Office of the Attorney General with regard to children. As a result, the Office is now in a better position to investigate cases of commercial sexual exploitation of children and to take steps to prevent and eliminate this worst form of child labour.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Access to free basic education. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, according to UNICEF statistics from 2006, the net attendance rate at primary school level is 80 per cent for girls and 77 per cent for boys, and at the secondary level, 36 per cent for girls and 29 per cent for boys. It also notes the information contained in a report of January 2008 on the ILO-IPEC project entitled "Elimination of child labour in Latin America. Phase III", according to which the goals of the plan on Education for All by 2015 will not be achieved. The Committee duly notes that, according to the document of the National Committee on the Gradual and Progressive Elimination of Child Labour (CNEGPT) on a second National Plan of Action for the gradual and progressive elimination of child labour in Honduras (2008–15) (the 2008 National Plan of Action), education is one of the components of the Plan. In this regard, it notes that the specific goal under this component is to promote access to education and ensure school attendance.

Although noting that the net rate of school attendance at the primary level is relatively high, the Committee expresses concern at the fact that the country will not achieve the goals on Education For All by 2015. It also expresses concern at the low net rate of school attendance at the secondary level. Considering that education contributes to preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee urges the Government to step up efforts to improve the operation of the education system in the country. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on the time-bound measures taken during the implementation of the 2008 National Plan of Action to increase the rate of school attendance, both at the primary and secondary levels. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved.

Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour. Commercial sexual exploitation. ILO-IPEC subregional project. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee duly notes the information provided by the Government that 134 girls and boys benefited from the ILO-IPEC subregional project on the commercial sexual exploitation of children in 2007. It also duly notes that, according to a 2007 report on that ILO-IPEC subregional project a system of assistance for victims of commercial sexual exploitation has been established. Furthermore, it notes that the National Plan of Action for the prevention and elimination of commercial sexual exploitation of girls, boys and adolescents in Honduras (2006–11) (the 2006 National Plan of Action) aims to: (a) prevent children from becoming victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for this purpose; and (b) provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of the child victims of these worst forms of child labour. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts and requests it to provide information on the time-bound measures taken in the context of the implementation of the ILO-IPEC subregional project on the commercial sexual exploitation of children and the 2006 National Plan of Action. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the system of assistance for victims of commercial sexual exploitation, in particular concerning the measures taken in the context of this system to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of victims of this worst form of child labour.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. 1. Street children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in its concluding observations of February 2007 (document CRC/C/HND/CO/3, paragraph 74), the Committee on the Rights of the Child, while noting the adoption of the National Plan of Action for the social integration of dependent children and women in the streets, expressed concern at the high number of street children and at the lack of information in this respect. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide any information on this subject. It reminds the Government that street children are particularly exposed to the worst forms of child labour. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to provide information on the time-bound measures taken, in the context of the implementation of the National Plan of Action for the social integration of dependent children and women in the streets, to protect street children from the worst forms of child labour. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of children who are actually removed from the streets.

2. Indigenous children. The Committee previously noted that, in its concluding observations of February 2007 (document CRC/C/HND/CO/3, paragraph 21), the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern at the lack of information concerning the most vulnerable groups, including indigenous children. The Committee notes with interest that, according to the information provided by the Government, a programme of action aimed at contributing to the prevention and removal of indigenous girls, boys and adolescents from child labour benefited 300 persons between October 2007 and February 2008. The Committee also notes that, according to the information available to the ILO–IPEC, a study on indigenous children has been carried out in the country. Noting that indigenous children are often victims of exploitation, which may take on very different forms, and are at risk of being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to protect these children, in particular by adopting measures to make them less vulnerable. It requests the Government to provide information in this regard.

Clause (e). Special situation of girls. Child domestic labour. The Committee previously noted that, according to the statistics contained in a study carried out in 2003 by the ILO–IPEC entitled “Child domestic labour in Honduras”, 94.3 per cent were girls. The Committee notes that, according to the 2006 statistics contained in a document of the CNEGPTE on the second National Plan of Action for the elimination of child labour (2008–15), a high number of children, particularly girls, are engaged in domestic work. It emphasizes that children engaged in domestic work, particularly young girls, are often victims of exploitation, which may take on very diverse forms, and that it is difficult to supervise their conditions of employment. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take effective and time-bound measures, particularly in the context of the implementation of the 2008 National Plan of Action, to protect child domestic workers against the worst forms of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard.

Article 8. International and regional cooperation. Commercial sexual exploitation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the ILO–IPEC subregional project on the commercial sexual exploitation of children provided for the strengthening of horizontal collaboration between countries participating in the project. The Committee held the view that cooperation between law enforcement agencies, particularly the judicial authorities and police forces, is indispensable to prevent and eliminate commercial sexual exploitation, and particularly the sale and trafficking of children for that purpose, through the collection and exchange of information and through assistance to detect and prosecute the individuals involved and to repatriate victims. The Committee notes that the Government’s report does not contain any information on this subject. It therefore expresses the hope once again that, in the context of the implementation of the ILO–IPEC subregional project on the commercial sexual exploitation of children, the Government will take measures to cooperate with the participating countries and therefore strengthen security measures, particularly on the common borders with El Salvador, Guatemala and Nicaragua, with a view to bringing an end to this worst form of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on this subject in its next report.

Furthermore, the Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Indonesia

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Scope of application. 1. Self-employment. The Committee had previously noted the indication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which child labour was widespread in Indonesia and most child labour took place in informal, unregulated activities, such as street vending, agricultural and domestic sectors. The Committee had also noted that Act No. 13 of 2003 (Manpower Act) appears to exclude from its application children who are engaged in self-employment or in employment without a clear wage relationship. The Committee notes the Government’s information that three workshops, with representatives from governmental and non-governmental organizations, as well as universities and the police force, were conducted in 2006 and 2007 to discuss appropriate solutions to deal with the situation of children working outside an employment relationship. The Government also indicates that a draft Government regulation on guidance concerning children working outside an employment relationship has been elaborated which aims to protect self-employed children, in accordance with section 75 of the Manpower Act. The Committee expresses the hope that the draft Government regulation on guidance concerning children working outside an employment relationship will be adopted in the very near future. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the draft Government regulation as soon as it has been adopted and to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

2. Domestic work. The Committee had previously noted the ITUC’s allegation in its communication of 6 September 2005 that girls as young as 12 years routinely work 14–18 hours a day, seven days a week, without a day off. It had noted the ITUC’s information that, although Indonesia ratified the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), and national law sets the minimum age for employment at 15 years, girls were found typically entering domestic work between the ages of 12 and 15, and some begin work even earlier. The Committee had also noted that the ITUC had indicated that it appeared that the Government had failed to take meaningful action to protect domestic workers – who number at a minimum 688,000 children – from exploitation and abuse, and that laws enacted to protect children from labour exploitation do not address child domestic labour.

The Committee notes that, according to the final report for the ILO–IPEC project entitled “Prevention and Elimination of Exploitative Child Domestic Work through Education and Training” (March 2004 – February 2006), the Association of Indonesia Domestic Workers Suppliers (APPSI) became involved in the movement to combat child domestic labour and, as a result, the project was able to reach out to the maximum number of potential child domestic workers and existing child domestic workers to protect their rights as children. However, the final report indicates that the Ministry of Manpower of Indonesia needs to be supported to set a legal framework for the protection of domestic workers. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government’s information that a draft Act on Domestic Workers’ Protection has been formulated, but that the elaboration of the final draft will take time because of the social, economic and cultural conditions in Indonesia. The Committee further notes the Government’s information that, in collaboration with non-governmental organizations, it has been making efforts to protect domestic workers, including emphasizing to APPSI the need to undertake to not supply children under 15 years of age for domestic work. The Committee once again expresses its deep concern at the situation of children under the age of 15 who work as domestic workers. It urges the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the situation and to ensure that children under 15 do not perform domestic work. It requests the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that the draft Act on Domestic Workers’ Protection is adopted in the very near future, so that child domestic workers benefit from the protection of the Convention. It also asks the Government to provide information in its next report on progress made in this regard.

Article 7. Light work. The Committee had previously noted the Government’s statement that ongoing discussions were being held regarding the criteria for the types of light work activities that may be performed by children aged between 13 and 15 years. It notes the Government’s information that activities which may be performed by children between 13 and 15 years of age are regulated by section 71 of the Manpower Act and by Ministerial Decree No. Kep 115/MEN/VII/2004, which establish the conditions under which children may be employed for developing talents and interests. The Committee observes that section 15 of the Ministerial Decree establishes some conditions for the employment of children under 15 years of age: obligation of a written agreement; assignment to be undertaken outside school hours; maximum working period of three hours a day and 12 hours a week; and respect of occupational safety and health regulations. However, the Committee also observes that no minimum age is set for children employed for developing talents and interests. If the Government intends to define light work activities as being activities for developing talents and interests, the Committee must remind the Government that, according to Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention, national laws or regulations may permit persons from 13 to 15 years of age to undertake light work. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take measures to ensure that only children aged at least 13 years are allowed to work or be employed for light work activities, including activities for developing talents and interests. It asks the Government to provide information on developments in this regard.

Article 9, paragraph 3. Keeping of registers. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that there is no provision in the Manpower Act, or in any other available legislation, prescribing that a register be kept and made available by the employer. It had noted the Government’s information that the labour inspectorate ensures that employers keep registers of children employed for developing their talents and interests. The Committee further notes that, while the Government indicates that it has attached a copy of the register form to its report, no such form was in fact sent to the Office. Noting the lack of information in the Government’s report on this point, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate whether – apart from the case of employers who employ children for developing their talents and interests – registers are kept by employers containing the names and ages or dates of birth, duly certified wherever possible, of persons whom they employ or who work for them and who are less than 18 years of age. If so, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the register form. If not, it urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that every employer, regardless of the number of the persons he/she employs and of the type of work, keeps a register indicating the name and age or date of birth, duly certified whenever possible, of persons whom he/she employs or who work for him/her and who are less than 18 years of age, in the very near future.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes that, according to the ILO–IPEC project entitled “Enhancing national capacity in child labour data collection, analysis and dissemination through technical assistance to surveys, research and training”, due to be completed on 30 September 2010, reliable national-level information on children in the age group of 5 to 17 years engaged in economic activities does not exist in Indonesia. It notes that the project aims to conduct a nationwide child labour survey as an add-on to a regular nationwide survey implemented by the national statistical office, BPS-Statistics Indonesia. The project will promote more effective national responses to child labourers and at-risk children by building national capacity in the collection and use of data upon which these responses are based. The Committee requests the Government to provide statistical data on the employment of children and young persons once it is available. It also requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied, including extracts from the reports of inspection services, information on the number and nature of contraventions reported and penalties applied.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Article 5 of the Convention. Monitoring mechanisms. The police and immigration officers. The Committee had previously noted that the police were carrying out investigations into prostitution areas in different provinces which sometimes resulted in the arrest of the perpetrators of trafficking and the finding and returning of victims to their places of origin. It had also noted that a two-year police training project was launched in August 2003, with the support of ILO-IPEC. The Committee had noted that 64 trafficking cases were filed in 2006 involving 177 children, of which 35 were before the courts while the rest were under investigation.

The Committee notes that, according to the technical proposal for the second phase of the National Plan of Action on the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (NPA) of 25 July 2007 (“technical proposal”), law enforcement against traffickers increased in 2006, with arrests up from the previous year by 29 per cent, prosecutions up 87 per cent, and convictions up 112 per cent. It notes the Government’s information that, in 2007, 123 trafficking cases were filed involving 71 children, of which 49 are before the courts, 70 are under investigation and three are under observation. The Government also indicates that it is taking measures to enhance the capacities of the police, immigration officers and labour inspectors. In this regard, it has conducted training on human trafficking for 38 police officers and 20 immigration officers; on preventing human trafficking for 19 police officers and five immigration officers; on investigating human trafficking for 25 police officers; and on border crimes for public prosecutors, judges and the police. The Committee urges the Government to continue its efforts in strengthening the role of the police and of immigration officers in order to enable them to combat the trafficking of children for labour and sexual exploitation. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied in this regard. It once again requests the Government to supply, with its next report, extracts of the inspection reports specifying the extent and nature of violations detected involving the trafficking of children for labour and sexual exploitation.

Article 6, paragraph 1. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. 1. National Action Plan for Abolishing Women and Child Trafficking. The Committee had previously noted that a five-year National Action Plan for Abolishing Women and Child Trafficking (NAP against WCT) was endorsed through Presidential Decree No. 88/2002. It had noted that the Plan’s objective consists of reducing by half the number of child victims of trafficking by 2013, as well as increasing the number of crisis service centres for the rehabilitation and social integration of child victims of trafficking. The Committee had also noted the Government’s statement that, as a result of the NAP against WCT, up to 1,404 children were prevented from entering prostitution and 174 were removed, and 200 special centres for combating trafficking were established. Noting the absence of information on this point in the Government’s report, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the results achieved by the NPA against WCT with regard to removing child victims of trafficking from labour or sexual exploitation and providing for their rehabilitation and social integration.

2. ILO-IPEC TICSAs Project on combating child trafficking for sexual and labour exploitation in South and South-East Asia – Phase II (TICSAs II) and National Plan of Action on the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (NPA). The Committee had previously noted that the subregional ILO-IPEC TICSAs Project was adopted in June 2003 to complement the ILO-IPEC Project of Support to the Indonesian NPA. The Committee notes the Government’s information that the TICSAs II Project in Indonesia has ended. It notes, however, that, in the framework of the ILO-IPEC project entitled “Support to the Indonesian National Plan of Action and the Development of the Time-bound Programme for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour” (TBP), efforts continue to be made to combat child trafficking for sexual and labour exploitation. In that regard, the technical progress report of September 2006 to February 2007 for the TBP (technical progress report for the TBP) indicates that 3,454 children were prevented from being trafficked and 142 were removed. It also notes that the technical proposal indicates that, in the second phase of the NPA (2006–10), it is planned that 5,000 children will be prevented from being trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation and 300 will be withdrawn. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the second phase of the NPA in combating the sexual and labour exploitation of children under 18 years of age, once it has been implemented, and the results attained.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and assisting the removal of children from these worst forms. 1. Commercial sexual exploitation of children. The Committee had previously noted the Government’s information that the National Plan of Action for the Elimination of the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children is implemented by the central and regional governments by sending children withdrawn from commercial sexual exploitation to rehabilitation centres (such as the Cipayang Rehabilitation Centre) and then back to their families. The Committee notes the Government’s information that, with ILO-IPEC support, as many as 4,935 were prevented from entering commercial sexual exploitation and 144 children removed, from 2002 to 2007. The Committee also notes that the ILO-IPEC action programme entitled “Combating commercial sexual exploitation of children and child trafficking in East Jakarta, Indonesia” (October 2006–September 2007) worked, in its first phase, with 43 young girls engaged in prostitution. Out of the 43 girls, 25 have exited prostitution and 18 others are still engaged in the trade. In its second phase, the action programme will continue to provide services for the girls targeted in the previous programme, and will also try to reach out to more young girls engaged in prostitution. However, the Committee notes with serious concern that, according to the summary outline for the action programme, an estimated 5,100 sex workers under 18 years of age operate in Jakarta alone. The Committee urges the Government to redouble its efforts to protect children under 18 years from commercial sexual exploitation. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of children who have been removed from commercial sexual exploitation and rehabilitated through the implementation of the National Plan of Action for the Elimination of the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children and the various ILO–IPEC action programmes.

2. Children engaged in the sale, production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee had previously noted that 15,000 children were involved in the sale, production and trafficking of drugs in Jakarta in 2003. The Committee notes that, according to the technical progress report for the TBP, as of 2007, 8,128 children were prevented from drug distribution and 476 withdrawn through implementation of the NPA and various ILO–IPEC action programmes. However, the Committee notes that the technical proposal indicates that various estimates suggest that between 500,000 and 1,200,000 young people below the age of 19 in Indonesia use drugs, and that as many as 20 per cent of drug users are involved in the sale, production or trafficking of drugs, suggesting that between 100,000 and 240,000 young persons might still be involved in the drug trade. In this regard, the technical proposal indicates that interventions on reintegration, rehabilitation and education will continue to be included within services targeted to that sector of worst forms of child labour. Expressing its serious concern at the high number of children and young persons involved in the drug trade, the Committee urges the Government to redouble its efforts to protect children under 18 years from the sale, production and trafficking of drugs. It requests the Government to provide concrete information on the number of children prevented from being engaged in the sale, production and trafficking of drugs, as well as those removed from this worst form of child labour.

Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. 1. Children on fishing platforms. The Committee had previously noted that more than 7,000 children were estimated to be engaged in deep-sea fishing in North Sumatra. It had noted the Government’s statement that one of the programmes adopted in implementing the NPA targets children working in the offshore fishery sector. In this regard, the Committee notes that, according to the technical progress report for the TBP, 417 children were withdrawn and 5,101 children were prevented from work in the fishing sector during the reporting period. Furthermore, the Committee notes that ILO–IPEC action programmes are still being implemented to protect children from this worst form of child labour. The programme entitled “Strengthening the Children’s Creativity Centre (CCC) of Bagan Asahan” aims to prevent 700 children from entering child labour in offshore fishing through the provision of a range of educational activities and services; the programme entitled “Strengthening Format CCC to eliminate and prevent child labour through collective learning in the child labour community” aims to prevent 300 children of Tanjung Tiram, Asahan, from becoming engaged in offshore fishing through a thematic learning programme; and the programme entitled “Preventing Worst Forms of Child Labour in the Fishing Sector through Improved Education and Skills Training and Community Action Against Child Labour” aims to combat child labour in the offshore fishing sector through the capacity building of schools and school committee members. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved through the implementation of the TBP and ILO–IPEC action programmes on preventing children under 18 years from being engaged on fishing platforms, and withdrawing and rehabilitating those that are engaged in deep-sea fishing.

2. Child domestic workers. The Committee had previously noted the allegations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that child domestic workers in Indonesia suffered some form of sexual, physical or psychological abuse. The ITUC had added that the NPA identified children who are physically or economically exploited as domestic servants as being involved in a worst form of child labour. However, domestic work was not included in the first phase of the NPA. The Committee had noted the various measures that were taken by the Government or by society at large to prevent children from working as domestic workers, including the programme set up by the Committee of National Action on the Worst Forms of Child Labour aimed at preventing school-aged children from working as domestic workers, as well the implementation of the programme “Mobilizing action for the protection of domestic workers from forced labour and trafficking in South-East Asia”.

The Committee notes that, according to the technical proposal, the second phase of the NPA will target children in or at risk of entering exploitative work in child domestic service. In this regard, it intends to prevent 5,000 children and withdraw 2,000 children from child domestic labour. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, according to the final report for the ILO–IPEC project entitled “Prevention and Elimination of Exploitative Child Domestic Work through Education and Training” (March 2004–February 2006), the Association of Indonesia Domestic Workers Suppliers became involved in the movement to combat child domestic labour and, as a result, the project was able to reach out to the maximum number of potential child domestic workers and existing child domestic workers to protect their rights as children. However, the final report indicates the need for a legal framework for the protection of domestic workers. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government’s statement that a draft Act on Domestic Workers’ Protection has been formulated, but that the elaboration of the final draft will take time because of the social, economic and cultural conditions in Indonesia. The Committee requests the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that the draft Act on Domestic Workers Protection is adopted in the very near future, so that child domestics are protected from the worst forms of child labour. It also requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the second phase of the NPA on protecting child domestic workers from the worst forms of child labour and providing for their rehabilitation and social integration and the results achieved.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Jordan

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1998)

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 73 of the Labour Code of 1996 prohibits the employment of minors under 16 years of age. It had noted, however, that according to section 2 of the Labour Code, a person under 16 years of age who performs work outside the framework of an employment contract does not benefit from the protection laid down therein. It had further observed that, by virtue of its section 3, the Labour Code shall not apply to: (a) members of the family of the employer working in his/her enterprise without remuneration; (b) domestic workers, gardeners, cooks and the like; and (c) agricultural workers excluding those who shall be covered by the Labour Code pursuant to a decision taken by the Council of Ministers upon the recommendation of the Minister of Labour. The Committee had reminded the Government that the Convention shall apply to all kinds of work or employment, regardless of the existence of an employment relationship. The Committee notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child also expressed its concern, in its concluding observations of 29 September 2006, that the “protection provided by the Labour Code does not apply for children working in the informal sector (for example, in small family enterprises, agriculture and domestic labour)” (CRC/C/JOR/CO/3, paragraph 88). The Committee notes the Government’s information that draft amendments to the Labour Code have been referred to the Council of Ministers, after consultation with the social partners. These draft amendments provide that workers in the domestic and agricultural sectors shall be governed by the provisions of the Labour Code, as well as by the regulations, instructions and orders promulgated pursuant to the Labour Code. The Committee trusts that the amendments to the Labour Code will ensure that children working in the informal sector, for example in small family enterprises as well as in the domestic and agricultural sectors, benefit from the protection laid down in the Convention. It requests the Government to supply a copy of the revised Labour Code, once the draft amendments have been adopted. Furthermore, noting the lack of information supplied by the Government on this point, the Committee requests it once again to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that self-employed children also benefit from the protection of the Convention.

Article 9, paragraph 1. Penalties. The Committee notes that section 77 of the Labour Code provides that any employer or manager who violates any section of chapter VIII of the Code, which includes section 73 on the minimum age for employment or work, is liable to a fine of no less than 100 and no more than 500 dinars. The fine is doubled every time the offence is repeated. However, according to the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 29 September 2006, “the employment of children has steadily grown in recent years, especially in agriculture” (CRC/C/JOR/CO/3, paragraph 88). Furthermore, according to the December 2006 ILO–IPEC study entitled “Rapid assessment on the worst forms of child labour in Jordan: Survey analysis”, official records suggest that there is a very weak enforcement of the articles of the Labour Code which deal with illegal employment of children. The Committee recalls that, by virtue of Article 9, paragraph 1, of the Convention, all necessary measures shall be taken by the competent authority to ensure the effective enforcement of the provisions of this Convention. The Committee considers it necessary to ensure the application of the Convention by applying the penalties provided for in the legislation. It accordingly requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that a person found to be in breach of the provisions relating to the employment of children is prosecuted and that adequate penalties are imposed. It asks the Government to provide information on the types of violations detected by the labour inspectors, the number of persons prosecuted and the penalties imposed.

Part V of the report form. Practical application of the Convention. The Committee notes that a rapid assessment survey on child labour and its worst forms was completed and published in December 2006 by the Centre for Strategic Studies of the University of Jordan, in collaboration with ILO–IPEC. The survey was undertaken in various governorates and included selected areas of Amman, Zarqa, Balqa, Irbid, Madaba and Aqaba. A total of 387 children between the ages of 9 and 17 were interviewed. The Committee notes that, according to the study, the average age of working children is 15 years. The study also reveals that the total number of working children (10 to 17 years) is estimated to be nearly 18,400, which is 1.5 per cent of the labour force in Jordan. Most of the working children are aged between 12 and 17 years, 78 per cent of them being boys and 22 per cent girls. Furthermore, it was found that 55 per cent of the children are employed in carpentry, blacksmith and painting occupations, while 31.6 per cent are employed in activities such as construction, bus driving, tailoring and in barber shops. The Committee also notes the detailed information provided in the rapid assessment survey with regard to the conditions in which children work, as well as working hours, tasks and occupational hazards or abuses faced by them. Thus, the survey reveals that the working hours appear to be very long: on average, 90 per cent of the working children work eight to 12 hours a day, with nearly 60 per cent working more than ten hours daily. The Committee observes that child workers must often carry heavy objects, lie on the ground in unhealthy positions and can be exposed to dangerous chemicals or heavy shaking or noise. Finally, the Committee notes that, according to the March 2007 Technical Progress Report on the ILO–IPEC National Programme to Eliminate Child Labour in Jordan, a national survey on child labour is currently being prepared in cooperation with the Jordanian Department of Statistics and SIMPOC, which will provide more extensive and reliable information on the phenomenon. The Committee expresses its concern at the situation of children working in Jordan and urges the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the situation. Furthermore, it requests the Government to supply information on any progress made with regard to the national survey on child labour and to supply a copy of it once finalized. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including statistical data on the employment of minors by age group, and information on the number and nature of contraventions reported.

Kenya

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It notes the adoption of the newly enacted Employment Act of 2007 which was supplied by the Government along with its report.

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Scope of application. 1. Branches of economic activity covered by the Convention. The Committee had previously noted that according to section 25(1) of the Employment Act, the prohibition on employing children (i.e. a person under 16 years of age according to section 2 of the Act) is limited to work performed in industrial undertakings. It had also noted the Government's information that the Employment Act was being revised and that the draft bill has extended the application of the minimum age for admission to employment to all sectors of the economy. It had requested the Government to provide information on the progress made in adopting the revised Employment Act. The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 56(1) of the Employment Act of 2007 extends the application of the minimum age for admission to employment to all undertakings.

2. Unpaid work. The Committee had previously noted that section 10(5) of the Children Act, 2001, defines the term "child labour" as any situation where a child provides labour in exchange for payment. It had observed that unpaid workers do not benefit from the protection laid down in the Children Act. Noting the Government's indication that it intended to harmonize all legislation dealing with children and child labour to conform to the provisions of this Convention, the Committee had expressed its hope that the necessary amendments would be adopted soon. The Committee notes with satisfaction that, according to section 56(1) of the Employment Act, except for light work, no person shall employ a child below 16 years of age whether gainfully or otherwise in any undertaking. It also notes the Government's information that the authoritative legislation on child labour will be the Employment Act of 2007.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee had previously noted that, under section 7(2) of the Children Act, every child shall be entitled to free basic education which shall be compulsory. It had also noted that, according to the Child Labour Report 1998-99 and the "Child Labour Policy", primary education is compulsory from 6 to 13 years of age. The Committee had further noted the Government's statement that the draft legislation on compulsory schooling which would address the gap between the age of completion of compulsory schooling, (14 years of age) and the minimum age for admission to employment or work (16 years of age), was being prepared. Noting the Government's indication that there exists no texts that specifically fixes the age for compulsory schooling, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate whether it is envisaged to adopt legislation which would fix the age of completion of compulsory schooling.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that children in Kenya complete schooling at different ages and that the Government has not envisaged fixing the age of completion of compulsory schooling. In this respect, the Committee refers to the information provided by the Government of Kenya to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2006 concerning the application of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138). The Government representative stated that it had appointed a committee to review the Education Act with a view to modifying, inter alia, the age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Conference Committee, while noting the Government's indication that it intended to adopt legislation dealing with children and child labour to conform to the provisions of Convention No. 138, recalled that this Convention had been ratified by Kenya more than 25 years ago. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating and preventing child labour, the Conference Committee urged the Government to ensure that legislation addressing the gap between the age of completion of compulsory schooling and the minimum age for admission to employment or work would be adopted shortly. The Committee urges the Government, in view of the commitment made by the Government representative to the Conference Committee over two years ago, to take without delay, the necessary measures to fix the age of completion of compulsory schooling at 16 years. It requests the Government to provide information on any developments made in this regard.

Article 3, paragraph 2. Determination of hazardous work. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that it had developed a draft list of types of hazardous work in consultation with social partners and stakeholders. It had requested the Government to provide a copy of the list of types of hazardous work as soon as it was adopted. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the stakeholders have approved a list of the types of hazardous work which will be presented to the National Labour Board for final approval, before the Minister assents to it as part of legislation. The Committee further notes that, while the Government indicates that it has sent a copy of the list of types of hazardous work along with its report, no such list was in fact sent to the Office. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to supply a copy of the list of the types of hazardous work as soon as it has been approved by the National Labour Board.

Article 3, paragraph 3. Admission to hazardous work as from 16 years of age. The Committee had previously noted that section 10(4) of the Children Act provides that the Minister shall make regulations in respect of periods of work and establishments where children aged at least 16 years may work, including hazardous work. It had also noted the Government's indication that the competent Minister had issued regulations referred to in section 10(4) of the Children Act, which is an act of Parliament. The Committee had requested the Government to provide a copy of these regulations. Noting that the Government has not provided a copy of the above regulations, the Committee once again requests the Government to supply a copy of the regulations issued under section 10(4) of the Children Act, along with its next report.

Article 6. Apprenticeship. The Committee had previously noted that, by virtue of section 8(3) of the Industrial Training Act (Chapter 237), a minor (i.e. a person under 15 years of age according to section 2 of the Industrial Training Act) may enter into an apprenticeship with the authorization of his/her parents or guardian or, in the absence of such authorization, of a district officer or labour officer. It had also taken note of section 25(2) of the Employment Act, 1976, which exempts a child employed in an industrial undertaking under a deed of apprenticeship from the minimum age for admission to employment. Noting that the national legislation does not contain any provision which fixes a minimum age for apprenticeship, the Committee had hoped that the necessary amendments would be adopted to bring the legislation in conformity with Article 6 of the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Industrial Training Act is being amended to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes that, according to section 58(1) of the Employment Act of 2007, no person shall employ a child of between 13 and 16 years of age, other than one serving under a contract of apprenticeship or indentured learnership in accordance with the provisions of the Industrial Training Act, in an industrial undertaking to attend to machinery. Similarly, section 57 of the Employment Act, which lays down the penalties for breach of the provisions of light work by children, exempts children between the ages of 13 and 16 years who are subject to the provisions of the Industrial Training Act relating to contracts of apprenticeship. The Committee observes that, according to the Employment Act of 2007, children between 13 and 16 years of age are allowed to take part in apprenticeship programmes subject to the provisions of the Industrial Training Act. In this regard, the Committee reminds the Government that Article 6 of the Convention fixes a minimum age of 14 years for work done in undertakings, where such work is carried out in accordance with conditions prescribed by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, where such exist, and is an integral part of: (a) a course of education or training for which a school or training institution is primarily responsible; (b) a programme of training, mainly or entirely, in an undertaking, which programme has been approved by the competent authority; or (c) a programme of guidance or orientation designed to facilitate the choice of an occupation. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the amendments to the Industrial Training Act will be in conformity with Article 6 of the Convention. It asks the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard in its next report.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Admission to light work. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that under section 3(1) of the Employment (Children) Rules 1977, children may be permitted to work with the written permission of an authorized officer, except in bars, hotels, restaurants or clubs where intoxicating liquors are sold, or as a tourist guide. Recalling that Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention permits only children from 13 years to undertake light work, the Committee urged the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that light work may only be performed by children of 13 years of age. The Committee notes with satisfaction that, according to section 56(2) of the Employment Act of 2007, a child between the ages of 13 and 16 years may be employed to perform light work which is not likely to be harmful to the child's health or development; and not such as to prejudice the child's attendance at school, or his/her participation in vocational orientation or training programmes.

Article 7, paragraph 3. Determination of light work. The Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to determine light work activities and to prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken by young persons of 13 years of age and above. The Committee notes that, according to section 56(3) of the Employment Act, the Minister may make rules prescribing light work in which a child of 13 years may be employed and the terms and conditions of that employment. The Committee notes the Government's information that the regulations governing light work are yet to be developed. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to determine the light work activities that may be undertaken by children of 13 years of age and to prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such work may be undertaken.

Article 8. Artistic performances. The Committee had previously noted section 17 of the Children Act, which provides that a child shall be entitled to leisure, play and participation in cultural and artistic activities. It had noted that the national legislation does not provide for permits to be granted to children participating in cultural artistic performances. Noting the Government's indication that this matter would be addressed during the revision of the Children Act, the Committee had asked the Government to provide information on the progress made in this respect. The Committee notes the Government's information that no consultations with the social partners with regard to the granting of individual permits for artistic performances have been so far undertaken. It further notes the Government's indication that this matter will be addressed in the subsidiary legislation yet to be undertaken. The Committee expresses the firm hope that in its next report the Government will provide information on the progress made in the revision of national legislation in order to ensure that approval for young persons below 16 years of age to take part in artistic performances is granted in individual cases. It also reminds the Government that the permits so granted must prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work shall be permitted.

Article 1 and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the Government's statement that it will endeavour to provide information on the practical application of the Convention, including statistical data on employment of children and inspection reports. The Committee notes that, according to the Kenya Integrated Household Budget Survey, 2005, a total number of 951,273 children were recorded as working, indicating a reduction compared to the 1.9 million working children between the ages of 5 to 17 years recorded in the 1998/99 Child Labour Report (National Plan of Action on the Elimination of Child Labour in Kenya, 2004–15, page 3, hereinafter National Plan of Action). This survey does not include children on the streets which are estimated to be over 700,000 in 2007, according to the UNICEF Review of Progress towards the World Fit for Children Plus 5 goals in Kenya. According to the report on the National Plan of Action, in Kenya, child labour is found in all sectors, especially in commercial and subsistence agriculture, domestic work and other sectors such as child prostitution and pornography, drug trafficking, hawking and herding. The Committee also notes that the National Plan of Action identified a number of factors which contribute to child labour, such as poverty, the HIV/AIDS pandemic, insecurity and conflicts, cultural practices which enhance child labour, weak institutions leading to challenges in enforcing legislations and implementation of policies, etc. The Committee notes that the Government signed a Memorandum of Understanding with ILO–IPEC in 1992, introducing a country programme on the elimination of child labour. It also notes that the Government developed a Time-bound Programme (TBP) in 2004 targeting the immediate elimination of the worst forms of child labour, and a National Policy on Child Labour in 2006. The Committee further notes that, within the context of the ILO–IPEC project “Building the Foundations for Eliminating the Worst Forms of Child Labour in Anglophone Africa” (Technical Progress Report, September 2005), a total of 453 children (216 girls and 237 boys) were withdrawn from the worst forms of child labour and supported to undergo skills training. According to the ILO–IPEC Technical Progress Report on sub-regional programme on Prevention, Withdrawal and Rehabilitation of Children Engaged in Hazardous Work in Commercial Agriculture in Eastern Africa (COMAGRI), 2004, a total of 2,363 children (1,069 girls and 1,294 boys) have been withdrawn from hazardous labour and placed in primary schools, as well as in vocational training facilities. While noting the efforts made by the Government to combat child labour, the Committee expresses serious concern at the situation of children under 16 years of age who are compelled to work in the country. The Committee, therefore, strongly encourages the Government to step up its efforts to progressively improve the situation of children under the age of 16 years who are compelled to work in Kenya. It also requests the Government to provide information on the National Policy on Child Labour and on the implementation of the National Plan of Action on Elimination of Child Labour and on the results achieved in terms of the progressive elimination of child labour. Furthermore, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, as required under Part V of the report form, for instance, extracts from official reports, statistics and information on inspection visits made and contraventions reported.

Malawi

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and practical application of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted its serious concern at the situation of the considerable number of children under 14 years of age who were compelled to work (according to the Malawi Child Labour Survey of 2002, more than 1 million children worked, of whom approximately half were less than 9 years of age). Moreover, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that a National Plan of Action for Orphans and Other Vulnerable Children 2005–09 (NPA for OVC) and a Childhood Development Policy were established. More particularly, it had noted that, according to the NPA for OVC, around 500,000 children were orphans due to HIV/AIDS in 2004 and more than 1 million children were orphans in Malawi in 2005. The Committee had noted that the Government was aware of the consequences of HIV/AIDS on orphans, such as increased child labour and children dropping out of school. It had also noted that the Strategic Objective No. 3 of the NPA for OVC was “to protect the most vulnerable children through improved policy and legislation, leadership, efficient coordination at all levels”.

The Committee notes the Government's information that it is difficult to measure the impact of specific policies on child labour unless detailed scientific measurement studies are undertaken. However, according to the preliminary report of the Malawi Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey of 2006, the total child labour rate in Malawi dropped from 37 per cent in 2004 to 29 per cent in 2006. According to the same report, approximately 90 per cent of the total number of child orphans in Malawi is made up of children aged 0 to 14 years. The Committee therefore once again observes that HIV/AIDS has consequences for orphans, for whom there is an increased risk of being engaged in child labour.

The Committee notes the implementation of the ILO–IPEC Country Programme to combat child labour in Malawi, the objective of which is to contribute to the progressive elimination of child labour. According to the technical progress report of March 2007, two country projects were launched on 26 February 2007: the ILO HIV/AIDS Workplace Education Programme and the HIV/AIDS in the Transport Sector. The ILO–IPEC Country Programme also features four action programmes, the objectives of which are to enhance community empowerment and awareness to prevent child labour and to train teachers to ensure an improvement in school retention rates and, consequently, contribute to the elimination of child labour. The Committee also notes the Government’s information, in its report under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that a National Action Plan on Child Labour is currently being developed and that a Child Labour Network, comprising all key organizations involved in the fight against child labour, has been formed to strengthen and increase the impact of child labour programmes.

While noting the improvement made in reducing child labour rates, the Committee nevertheless urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure the progressive abolition of child labour. It also requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in the elaboration of the National Action Plan on Child Labour and asks the Government to supply a copy of it as soon as it is adopted. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the other measures it has taken, such as the ILO–IPEC programmes and the HIV/AIDS country projects and their impact towards abolishing child labour. Finally, the Committee also once again requests the Government to continue providing information on the application of the Convention in practice, including, for example, statistics on the employment of children and young persons, extracts from the reports of the inspections services and information on the number and nature of the contraventions reported and sanctions imposed.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government on other points.

Malaysia

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1997)

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee had previously noted that the provisions of the Children and Young Persons (Employment) Act of 1966 (CYP Act), with regard to the minimum age for employment or work, were not in conformity with the age specified by the Government when ratifying the Convention. Indeed, although the Government, at the time of ratifying the Convention, declared 15 years as the minimum age for admission to employment, section 2(1) of the CYP Act provides that no “child” – who is a person under 14, according to section 1(A) – shall be engaged in any employment. The Committee had also noted the Government’s information that a tripartite committee would review the labour legislation, taking into consideration the possibility of increasing the minimum age for admission to employment. The Committee had asked the Government to provide information on developments concerning this legislative review, especially with regard to the measures taken to bring the minimum age for admission to employment (14 years) into conformity with the one declared (15 years). The Committee notes the Government’s information that the CYP Act does not outlaw child labour, but rather governs and protects children who work. The Committee recalls that, by virtue of Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention, no one under the age specified by the Government when ratifying the Convention shall be admitted to employment or work in any occupation. The Committee notes that, according to the Committee on the Rights of the Child in its concluding observations of 25 June 2007, Malaysia is still in the process of amending the CYP Act to provide better protection for working children (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 90). Noting that the Government has referred to the legislative review of the CYP Act for a number of years, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in the very near future to ensure that the minimum age for employment or work is raised to 15 years, as specified by the Government at the time of ratification.

Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2. Minimum age for admission to, and determination of, hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the relevant legislation does not contain any provisions prohibiting young people under 18 years of age from being employed in types of work likely to jeopardize their health, safety or morals. The Committee had noted the Government’s statement that efforts would be undertaken to ensure that Article 3 of the Convention is complied with. In this regard, the Committee notes that, in its report, the Government refers to two prohibitions provided for in the CYP Act for children and young people: (i) managing or being in close proximity to machinery; and (ii) working underground. The Committee observes that section 2(5) of the CYP Act provides that no child or young person shall be, or required or permitted to be, engaged in any employment contrary to the provisions of the Factories and Machinery Act 1967 or the Electricity Act 1949 or in any employment requiring them to work underground. The Committee notes that section 1A(1) of the CYP Act defines a “child” as being any person who has not completed their 14th year of age, and a “young person” as being any person who has not completed their 16th year of age. The Committee once again reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 3, paragraph 1, of the Convention, the minimum age for hazardous work shall not be less than 18 years. The Committee also once again reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Convention, the types of hazardous work to which paragraph 1 of this Article applies, shall be determined by national laws or by the competent authority after consultations with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that no one under 18 years of age is authorized to perform hazardous work, in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to include in national legislation provisions determining types of hazardous work to be prohibited to people below 18 years of age, in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Convention. Finally, the Committee also once again requests the Government to provide information on the consultations held with the organizations of employers and workers concerned with this subject.

Article 3, paragraph 3. Admission to hazardous work as from 16 years. The Committee had previously noted that certain provisions of the CYP Act allow young people of 16 years and above to perform types of hazardous work under certain conditions. The Committee reminded the Government that, under the terms of Article 3, paragraph 3, of the Convention, national laws or regulations may, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, authorize the performance of types of hazardous work by young people between 16 and 18 years of age, on condition that the health, safety and morals of the young people concerned are fully protected and that they have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. It also recalled that this provision of the Convention consists of a limited exception to the general rule of the prohibition placed upon young people under 18 years of age, and not a total authorization for the performance of types of hazardous work from the age of 16 years. Noting the absence of information in the Government's report on this point, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the performance of types of hazardous work done by young people between 16 and 18 years of age is only authorized in accordance with the requirements of Article 3, paragraph 3, of the Convention.

Article 7. Light work. The Committee had previously noted that section 2(2)(a) of the CYP Act allows people under 14 years of age to be employed in light work which is adequate to their capacity, in any undertaking carried on by their family. It had, however, noted that the legislation does not specify a minimum age for admission to light work. The Committee had reminded the Government that Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention, provides for the possibility of admitting young people of 13 years of age to light work. The Committee had also recalled that, according to Article 7, paragraph 3, the competent authority shall determine and prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken. With regard to the definition of light work, the Committee drew the Government's attention to Paragraph 13(b) of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146). Paragraph 13(b) states that, in giving effect to Article 7, paragraph 3, of the Convention, special attention should be given to the strict limitation of hours spent at work in a day and in a week, and the prohibition of overtime, so as to allow enough time for education and training (including the time needed for homework), for rest during the day, and for leisure activities.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the CYP Act permits children and young people to work in just about any establishment that adults can be found in, including hotels, bars and other places of entertainment, if their parents or guardian own or work in the same establishment. The Committee shares the concern of the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 25 June 2007, that the provisions of the CYP Act concerning light work permit, among other things, employment involving light work without detailing the acceptable conditions of performing such work (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 90). Accordingly, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that national law and practice are in conformity with the requirements of the Convention on the following points: (i) that the minimum age of 13 years for light work be established by legislation; and (ii) that, in the absence of a definition of light work in the legislation, the competent authority should determine what is light work and should prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken.

Parts III and V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the Government's information that the responsibility of the enforcement of the CYP Act rests solely with the Ministry of Human Resources. The Ministry has a legal duty to ensure that employers comply with the minimum standards and hours of work, rest times and places of work. However, the Committee notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern, in its concluding observations of 25 June 2007, that the enforcement of Convention No. 138 remains weak (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 90).

Furthermore, the Committee once again notes the Government's statement that statistical data is not available. In this regard, the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed its regret at the lack of a national data collection system and at the insufficient data on working children. Accordingly, the Committee on the Rights of the Child recommended that Malaysia strengthen its mechanisms for data collection by establishing a national centre database on children (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraphs 25 and 26). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the provisions giving effect to the Convention are effectively enforced. It also strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sufficient data on the situation of working children in Malaysia is available. It once again asks the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice including, for example, statistics on the employment of children and young people and extracts from the reports of inspection services, as soon as this information becomes available.

The Committee also once again urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that, during its review of the CYP Act by the tripartite committee set up for this purpose, due consideration is given to the Committee's detailed comments on the discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in the review of the CYP Act in its next report and once again invites the Government to consider seeking technical assistance from the ILO.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 98th Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2009.]

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee had previously noted that section 17(1) and (2) of the Child Act of 2001 only refers indirectly to the use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances and that there appear to be no specific provisions that explicitly prohibit and punish such acts committed by persons other than the child's parents, guardian or extended family. The Committee further notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 25 June 2007, expressed regret at the absence of specific legislation against Internet-related sexual offences, including child pornography (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 99). Noting the lack of information on this point, the Committee requests the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that the use, procuring or offering by anyone of a child under 18 years of age for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances is prohibited, as a matter of urgency.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee had previously noted that section 32 of the Child Act of 2001 punishes anyone who causes or procures or allows any person under 18 years of age to be on any street, premises or place for the purposes of "carrying out illegal hawking, illegal lotteries or gambling, or other illegal activities detrimental to the health or welfare of the child". However, the Committee had noted that there seem to be no specific provisions which explicitly prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child for the production and trafficking of drugs. It had accordingly asked the Government to provide information on the meaning of "illegal activities detrimental to the health or welfare of the child" pursuant to section 32. Noting the absence of information on this point, the Committee once again requests the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that the use, procuring or offering of a child under 18 years of age for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs, is prohibited, as a matter of urgency.

Clause (d) and Article 4, paragraph 1. Hazardous work and determination of hazardous work. The Committee had previously noted that the relevant legislation does not contain any provisions prohibiting young people under 18 years of age from being employed in types of work likely to harm their health, safety or morals. The Committee had also noted that the Children and Young Persons (Employment) Act of 1966 (CYP Act) does not provide for a list of types of hazardous work to be prohibited for children under 18 years of age. It had reminded the Government that Article 4, paragraph 1, of the Convention states that the types of work referred to under Article 3(d) shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, taking into consideration relevant international standards, in particular Paragraph 3 of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Recommendation, 1999 (No. 190). The Committee had noted the Government's statement that Paragraph 3 of Recommendation No. 190 will be analysed and incorporated into the review of the CYP Act carried out by the tripartite committee set up for this purpose, after consultations with employers' and workers' organizations.

The Committee notes that, in its report under the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), the Government refers to two prohibitions provided for in the CYP Act, for children and young persons: (i) managing or being in close proximity to machinery; and (ii) working underground. The Committee observes that section 2(5) of the CYP Act provides that no child or young person shall be, or required or permitted to be, engaged in any employment contrary to the provisions of the Factories and Machinery Act, 1967, or the Electricity Act, 1949, or in any employment requiring them to work underground. The Committee notes that section 1A(1) of the CYP Act defines a "child" as being any person who has not completed their 14th year of age, and a "young person" as being any person who has not completed their 16th year of age. Furthermore, the Committee observes that, in its concluding observations of 25 June 2007, the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed alarm at the high number of migrant domestic workers, including child domestic workers, who work under conditions that are hazardous and interfere with the child's education, and are harmful to the child's health and physical, mental, spiritual, moral or social development (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 91). The Committee once again reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(d) of the Convention, hazardous work constitutes one of the worst forms of child labour and consequently shall be prohibited for children under 18 years of age. The Committee requests the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that children under 18 years of age do not carry out work which is likely to harm their health, safety or morals, as a matter of urgency. It also requests the Government to take immediate measures to adopt a list of types of hazardous work in the very near future and to provide a copy of the list once it has been adopted, after consultations with the organizations of employers and workers concerned.

Article 4, paragraph 2. Identification of hazardous work. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to identify where the types of hazardous work exist, in consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. Noting the lack of information on this point, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on whether hazardous types of work have been identified by the Department of Safety and Health pursuant to Article 4, paragraph 2, of the Convention.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. The Committee had previously noted that, by virtue of section 3 of the Child Act of 2001, a "coordinating council for the protection of children" will be established. The Committee notes the Government's information that the Coordinating Council for the Protection of Children (CCPC) was indeed established, which is the main body mandated to advise the Minister of Women, Family and Community Development on all aspects of child protection. The CCPC also provides advice on the management of child protection teams throughout the country. The Committee further notes the Government's information that the National Advisory and Consultative Council for Children (NACCC), that was established in 2001, acts as a focal point for children's well-being and development, in line with the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the National Action Plan for Children. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken by the CCPC and the NACCC to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour.

Article 6. Programmes of action. The Committee had previously noted that the Ministry of Human Resources was working with other authorities to design a national plan of action for children. It notes that, according to the concluding observations of 25 June 2007 of the Committee on the Rights of the Child, a National Plan of Action for Children by the Ministry of Women, Family and Community Development is currently under way and will be streamlined with the National Child Policy (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 17). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the National Plan of Action for Children and on any relevant impact on the elimination of the worst forms of child labour.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Penalties. The Committee had previously noted that sections 32(b), 43 and 48 of the Child Act of 2001, and sections 367, 370 and 372–374 of the Penal Code, establish sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties of imprisonment and fines for breach of the provisions prohibiting: the sale and trafficking of children for the purposes of sexual and labour exploitation; the procuring of a child for the purpose of begging or carrying out illicit activities; the kidnapping or abduction of a person for the purpose of slavery; and the exploitation and the incitement of a person for the purpose of prostitution. The Committee notes the concern expressed by the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 25 June 2007, that the enforcement of ILO Convention No. 182 remains weak. The Committee reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention, ratifying countries are required to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including through the provision and application of penal sanctions. It accordingly requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that a person found to be in breach of the provisions relating to the worst forms of child labour mentioned above is prosecuted and that adequate penalties are imposed. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the application of these penalties in practice including the number and nature of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties applied.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Prevention of the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Education. The Committee notes that, according to the concluding observations of the Committee on the Rights of the Child of 25 June 2007, the enrolment rate of girls and boys in primary education is relatively equal. However, the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed regret that, according to estimates, 200,000 children of primary-school age are not attending school. The Committee on the Rights of the Child also expressed concern at the regional disparities in the drop-out rates. For example, the proportion of children reaching grade 5 in Sabah has decreased significantly. Furthermore, the Committee on the Rights of the Child also expressed its regret that many children, in particular boys, drop out from secondary education (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 73). In view of the fact that education contributes to preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to take measures to ensure free basic education and to keep children in school. The Committee also asks the Government to supply updated data on the enrolment and drop-out rates in school.

Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour, and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child victims of trafficking. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the Trafficking in Women and Children Report of the Human Rights Commission of Malaysia (SUHAKAM) of 2004, shows that Malaysia is considered primarily a destination country for victims of trafficking, so that the majority of child victims of trafficking in Malaysia are foreign girls. The findings of the report showed that, even if the trafficking involved mostly women over 18 years of age, a number of girls between 14 and 17 years of age were also reported to be victims of trafficking. The Committee had noted that, according to this source, a "Forum on Trafficking in Women and Children – A Cross-Border and Regional Perspective" was organized and held by SUHAKAM in April 2004, in order to forge a national and regional collaborative response to trafficking. The central aim of the Forum was to facilitate discussion on steps taken or required at the national and regional levels against the backdrop of developments and various measures and programmes were envisaged.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the Ministry of Women, Family and Community Development has undertaken steps to address issues relating to human trafficking since 2005, with the collaboration of other ministries, agencies and non-governmental organizations, including establishing shelter homes for women and child victims of trafficking and training enforcement officers. The Committee notes that, according to the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 25 June 2007, a Coordinating Committee on Trafficking was established in July 2006 (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 95). Furthermore, the Government indicates in its report that the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Bill was passed by Parliament on 24 May 2007, and published in July 2007. Under the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act, a Council for Anti-Trafficking in Persons shall be established to, among other things, coordinate the implementation of the Act, formulate and oversee the implementation of a national plan of action on the prevention and suppression of the trafficking of persons and provide care, support and protection to victims of trafficking. However, the Committee notes the grave concern expressed by the Committee on the Rights of the Child on the absence of a specific law and policy to combat inter-country trafficking (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 95). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the concrete impact of the abovementioned measures on the rehabilitation and social integration of children under 18 who are victims of trafficking, and the results attained. The Committee also asks the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to ensure that children under 18 years of age who are victims of inter-country trafficking are rehabilitated and integrated, and to provide information on progress made in this regard.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. Regional cooperation. The Committee had previously noted that a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) between Malaysia and Thailand was proposed as a beginning to reduce the flow of young girls into Malaysia and allow for an exchange of information in order to monitor traffickers' actions. Noting the lack of information on this point, the Committee once again asks the Government to provide further information on this MOU and its impact towards eliminating the trafficking of children under 18 years of age for labour or sexual exploitation.

Parts IV and V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of 25 June 2007, the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed regret that Malaysia could not present studies on the extent and nature of the problem of children living and/or working in the streets, particularly in Sabah (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 93). The Committee on the Rights of the Child also expressed regret at the insufficient data on child victims of trafficking for exploitative purposes and the sexual exploitation of children (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 25). The Committee notes the Government's information that the Council for Anti-Trafficking of Persons that shall be established under the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act will collect data, information and research on the prevention and suppression of trafficking in persons. The Committee urges the Government to take measures to ensure that sufficient data on the phenomena of child trafficking, the commercial sexual exploitation of children and street children is available. The Committee also once again requests the Government to supply, as soon as this information becomes available, copies or extracts from official documents including inspection reports, studies and inquiries.

The Committee also urges the Government to ensure that, during its review of national legislation including the CYP Act, due consideration is given to the Committee's detailed comments on the discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard in its next report and once again invites the Government to consider seeking technical assistance from the ILO.

Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 90) (ratification: 1956)

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Period during which night work is prohibited. In its previous comments, the Committee pointed out that, by defining night work as work performed between 8 p.m. and 6 a.m., i.e. a period of ten hours, section 60 of the Federal Labour Act fails to give effect to Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention, which defines "night" as a period of at least 12 consecutive hours.

In its report, the Government indicates that the national legislation on night work has not been amended. It further indicates that the labour inspectorate carried out more than 35,600 inspections of workplaces likely to be concerned by the application of the federal labour legislation governing night work and that they found no minors working at night in these enterprises. The Committee reminds the Government that, according to Article 2 of the Convention, the term "night" signifies a period of at least 12 consecutive hours, and that during this period work by young persons is prohibited. This 12-hour period includes different intervals, prescribed according to age, for the purpose of exceptions that may be allowed to the prohibition on night work for young persons under 18 years of age. While noting that section 175 of the Federal Labour Act prohibits night work by young persons under 18 years of age in industry, in accordance with Articles 3(d) and 4 of Convention No. 182, the Committee again observes that section 60 of the Federal Labour Act, by providing that "night" is the interval between 8 p.m. and 6 a.m., establishes a period of ten hours during which work by minors is prohibited. By so doing, section 60 of the Federal Labour Act is inconsistent with Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention, which imposes a period of at least 12 consecutive hours. The Committee notes with regret that, despite the request which it has repeatedly made since 1972, no measures have been taken to give effect to the Convention. It urges the Government to take the necessary steps as soon as possible to bring the Federal Labour Act into line with the Convention and practice on this point.

Netherlands

Aruba

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138)

Article 2, paragraph 3, of the Convention. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the Government of Aruba had made a commitment to ensure that all children receive compulsory education up to the age of 17 years. The Committee notes the Government's information that the State Ordinance on Compulsory Education has not yet been approved and that it will supply a copy of the Ordinance once it has been adopted. The Committee trusts that the State Ordinance on Compulsory Education will be in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3, of the Convention. Considering that there is presently no specified age of completion of compulsory schooling in Aruba and that the Government has been referring to the enactment of the State Ordinance on Compulsory Education for a number of years, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that it is adopted in the very near future.

Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2. Hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 17(1) of the Labour Ordinance provides that it is prohibited to cause women and juvenile persons to perform night work or work of a hazardous nature, which is to be described by a state decree. Section 4 of this Ordinance defines juveniles as persons who have reached the age of 14, but not yet the age of 18. The Committee had requested the Government to indicate any progress made towards the enactment of the state decree to specify the types of hazardous work that should not be assigned to young persons under 18 years of age. It had noted the Government's information that one of the tasks of the Committee for the Modernization of Labour Legislation (CMLL) is to fill the existing voids in the legislation, creating the state decrees (which have yet to be formalized) referred to in the Labour Ordinance. The Committee notes the Government's information that discussions within the CMLL are still in progress. Considering that the Government has been referring to the enactment of the state decree provided for under section 17(1) of the Labour Ordinance determining the types of hazardous work for a number of years, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that it is adopted in the very near future. It requests the Government to provide a copy of said state decree once it has been adopted.

Article 6. Vocational training and apprenticeship. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the state decree provided for under section 16(a) of the Labour Ordinance allows exemptions for certain tasks which are necessary for the learning of a trade or profession, and can be done by children of 12 years or over who have completed the sixth class of primary school. It had also noted the Government's information that there were no instances recorded to indicate that children between 12 and 14 years of age are employed for training purposes. Noting the Government's information that it will supply a copy of the state decree specifying the employment permitted for vocational education or technical training purposes once it has been elaborated and enacted, the Committee requests it to provide a copy thereof once it has been adopted.

Article 7. Light work. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the progress made with regard to the state decree provided for under section 16(b) of the Labour Ordinance to specify certain tasks which can be carried out by children of 12 years of age and above who have completed the sixth class of primary school. The Committee had recalled that Article 7, paragraph 3, of the Convention requires that the competent authority determine the activities allowed as light work in which young persons between 12 and 14 years of age may be permitted to participate, and to prescribe the number of hours of work and the conditions of employment or work. It notes the Government's information that it will supply a copy of the state decree on light work activities once it has been elaborated and enacted. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the state decree provided for under section 16(b) of the Labour Ordinance will be adopted at the earliest possible date and requests the Government to provide information on all progress made in this regard.

Part V of the report form. Practical application of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's information that the labour inspection did not report any violations with regard to national legislation on child labour or the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide more detailed information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice including statistical data disaggregated by sex and age on the nature, extent and trends in child labour and extracts from the reports of inspection services, information on the number and nature of contraventions reported and penalties applied.

Nicaragua

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1981)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of June 2005 (CRC/C/15/Add.265, paragraph 61), expressed concern at the information that child labour has increased consistently in Nicaragua in the last years due to migration from the countryside and the intensification of poverty. The Committee also noted that, according to the statistics contained in the national report on child labour, compiled by the Statistical Information and Monitoring Programme on Child Labour (SIMPOC) and published by ILO-IPEC in April 2003, around 253,057 children between the ages of 5 and 17 are engaged in economic activity. While observing that there appear to be difficulties in the application of the Regulations on Child Labour and that child labour constitutes a problem in practice, the Committee noted that the Government was drawing up a National Strategic Plan for the Progressive Elimination of Child Labour and the Protection of Young Workers (2006–10) and that a study on child labour in the country was due to be prepared in November 2005.

The Committee notes that according to the national study on child labour of 2005 (ENTIA, 2005), 239,220 children between the ages of 5 and 17 years were engaged in work in the country. The Committee notes with interest that, according to the final evaluation report of the National Strategic Plan for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour and the Protection of Young Workers (2001–05) (Strategic Plan 2001–05) of October 2006, child labour has decreased by around 6 per cent since 2000. According to this final report, over 100,000 children in poor families received direct or indirect assistance from the various actors in civil society who were engaged in the implementation of the Strategic Plan 2001–05. Furthermore, 14,075 children benefited from action programmes on the worst forms of child labour implemented by ILO–IPEC in the country.

The Committee notes the draft Decent Work Country Programme for Nicaragua and observes that measures are envisaged to improve the application of standards relating to child labour and to continue efforts for the progressive elimination of child labour by 2015, with particular reference to the worst forms of child labour. Furthermore, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government according to which a second National Strategic Plan for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour and the Protection of Young Workers (2007–16) is under preparation. The Committee expresses appreciation of the measures adopted by the Government for the abolition of child labour, which it considers to be an affirmation of the political will to develop strategies to combat this problem. It therefore strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to combat child labour and requests it to provide information on the measures that will be taken for the elimination of child labour in the context of the Decent Work Country Programme. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the second National Strategic Plan for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour and the Protection of Young Workers (2007–16) and the programmes of action that are implemented in the context of this Plan, as well as on the results achieved in terms of the progressive abolition of child labour. It also invites the Government to continue providing information on the application of the Convention in practice including, for example, statistical data on the employment of children and young persons and extracts of the reports of the inspection services.

Article 2, paragraph 1. 1. Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, despite the amendments made to sections 130 and 131 of the Labour Code by Act No. 474 of 21 October 2003, the Labour Code still does not apply to employment relationships that are not derived from an employment contract, such as work performed by children on their own account. The Committee reminded the Government that the Convention applies to all sectors of economic activity and that it covers all forms of employment or work, whether or not an employment contract exists and whether or not the work is paid. It requested the Government to provide information on the manner in which the protection envisaged by the Convention is ensured in the case of children engaged in an economic activity that is not covered by an employment relationship, such as work performed on their own account.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government according to which Ministerial Agreement JCHG-008-05-07 on the implementation of Act No. 474 provides that the General Directorate of Labour Inspection shall be responsible for the implementation of Act No. 474 and the organization of a system of inspection for the prevention of child labour and its supervision in accordance with the rights of young persons engaged in work in the formal and informal sectors. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that, with a view to increasing labour inspection activities in the informal economy, and particularly to eliminating child labour, the labour inspection system has been strengthened through links with various governmental and non-governmental organizations. Accordingly, the labour inspectorate for children and the general labour inspectorate will collaborate with a view to protecting children from work, and from the worst forms of child labour, and removing them from exploitation. Taking due note of the information provided by the Government, the Committee requests it to provide information on the measures adopted by the labour inspection service for children and the general labour inspectorate to protect and remove children from child labour who are not bound by an employment relationship, such as those who work on their own account.

2. Minimum age for admission to light employment and work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 134 of the Labour Code does not regulate the performance of light work by children between the ages of 12 and 14 years, as envisaged in Article 7 of the Convention. Furthermore, it noted the statistics on work by children under 14 years of age contained in the report on child labour compiled by SIMPOC and published by ILO–IPEC in April 2003, which indicate that in practice a considerable number of children engaged in work are under 14 years of age. In view of the situation prevailing in the country, the Committee invited the Government to establish a system regulating the employment of children aged between 12 and 14 years on light work, in accordance with the conditions set out in Article 7 of the Convention.

In its report, the Government indicates that Act No. 474 regulates work by children and establishes 14 years as the minimum age for admission to employment, without any exception to this age being envisaged. While noting the Government's indications, the Committee notes once again that, according to ENTIA, 2005, a certain number of children aged between 12 and 14 years, which is below the minimum age for admission to employment, are engaged in work. The Committee recalls that under Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention, no one under the minimum age shall be admitted to employment or work in any occupation, with the exception of light work, and it requests the Government to provide information on the measures that it intends to take to bring an end to work by children under 14 years of age.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee notes that, according to UNESCO statistics, 86 per cent of girls and 88 per cent of boys attend primary school, compared with 46 per cent of girls and 40 per cent of boys attend secondary school. The Committee notes that, according to the final evaluation report of the Strategic Plan 2001–05, a special school enrolment plan resulted in the re-enrolment of over 3,455 boys and 2,742 girls in primary school in 2005, and over 50,000 children in 2006. However, according to this report, over 150,000 children between the ages of 7 and 12 years are not enrolled in school each year. Furthermore, the report notes an increase in the school drop-out rate over the past six years, particularly due to poverty which constrains children, and particularly boys, to work. Despite the efforts made by the Government, the Committee expresses concern at the low attendance rates for secondary school. It observes that poverty is one of the primary causes of child labour and that, when combined with a deficient education system, it hinders the development of the child. Considering that education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to increase the school attendance rate and reduce the school drop-out rate so as to prevent children under 14 years of age to work, particularly on their own account. It also requests the Government to intensify its efforts to combat child labour by reinforcing measures that allow child workers to be integrated into the school system, whether formal or informal, or into vocational training, provided that the minimum age criteria with regard to employment or work are respected.

Article 3, paragraph 2. Determination of hazardous types of work. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Ministerial Agreement No. VGC-AM-0020-10-06 respecting the list of hazardous types of work applicable in Nicaragua of 14 November 2006, which was drawn up in consultation with the organizations of employers and workers and civil society, and contains a detailed list of hazardous types of work.

Nigeria

Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention, 1965 (No. 123) (ratification: 1974)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that for a number of years, it has been requesting the Government to indicate measures taken to give effect to the Convention (Article 4, paragraph 5), under which the employer shall make available to the workers' representatives, at their request, lists of the persons who are employed in work underground and who are less than two years older than the minimum age specified by the Government which is 16 years. The lists should contain the dates of birth of persons aged between 16 and 18 years and the dates at which they were employed or worked underground in the undertaking for the first time.

The Committee noted that under section 62 of the Labour Act, every employer is required to keep a register of all young persons in his employment with particulars of their ages, the date of employment and the conditions and nature of their employment and to produce the register for inspection when required by an authorized labour officer. The Committee further noted that under section 91(1) of the same Act, "young person" means a person under the age of 18 years and "industrial undertaking" includes mines, quarries and other works for the extraction of minerals from the earth. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that section 62 of the Labour Act is amended so that such registers may also be made available to workers' representatives, at their request. The Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on progress made in this regard in its next report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Pakistan

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the communications of the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU) of 30 March 2007 and of the Pakistan Workers' Federation (PWF) of 2 May 2007.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee had previously noted the allegations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which trafficking in persons is a serious problem in Pakistan, including the trafficking of children. Women and children reportedly arrive from Bangladesh, Myanmar, Afghanistan, Sri Lanka and India, many to be bought and sold in shops and brothels. The Committee had also noted that the ITUC's allegations that several hundred boys from Pakistan were trafficked to the Gulf States to work as camel jockeys. Moreover, in some rural areas, children are sold into debt bondage in exchange for money or land. The Committee had noted that the ILO-IPEC launched in 2000 the subregional project to combat child trafficking (TICSA) in Bangladesh, Nepal and Sri Lanka and that the project was subsequently extended to Pakistan, Indonesia and Thailand. According to the project report of September 2002 (pages 14–15), approximately 100,000 women and children were internally trafficked in Pakistan, and approximately 200,000 women and children were trafficked from Bangladesh to Pakistan between 1990 and 2000. The Committee had also noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC/C/15/Add.217, 27 October 2003, paragraph 76), while noting the serious efforts undertaken by the State party to prevent child trafficking, had expressed its deep concern at the very high incidence of trafficking in children for the purposes of sexual exploitation, bonded labour and camel jockeying.

The Committee had observed that sections 2(f) and 3 of the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance of 2002 provide that human trafficking for the purpose of exploitative entertainment (i.e. activities in connection with sex), slavery or forced labour is prohibited. Section 370 of the Penal Code also prohibits the sale and trafficking of persons for the purpose of slavery.

The Committee notes that, according to the Technical Project Report of March 2006 for the second phase of the TICSAs project (TICSAs-II), a regional legal review was commissioned in early 2005 and has been completed to contribute to the improvement of national capacity to make legal reforms in the light of the international instruments to combat trafficking and towards effective enforcement of relevant laws and regulations to combat child trafficking for sexual and labour exploitation. By reviewing the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance of 2002, it was observed that the definition of “human trafficking” fails to recognize the transfer and transportation of persons as important parts of the trafficking process. Moreover, the definition focuses only on transportation in and out of Pakistan and ignores trafficking within Pakistan, which is prevalent in the country. The Committee notes that in order to discuss the findings of the review, a tripartite regional workshop was organized and that recommendations were made to amend the legislation and strengthen implementing and monitoring mechanisms.

The Committee consequently observes that, although national legislation exists to prohibit the trafficking of children for labour or sexual exploitation, it is not comprehensive and trafficking remains an issue of concern in practice. The Committee requests the Government to take immediate measures to ensure that the transfer and transportation of children under 18 years of age for labour and sexual exploitation, as well as the internal trafficking of children under 18 for the same purposes, is effectively prohibited in national legislation. The Committee also once again invites the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the situation and to take the necessary measures to eliminate the internal and cross-border trafficking of children under 18 for labour and sexual exploitation. It once again asks the Government to provide information on progress made in this regard.

2. Debt bondage. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the ITUC’s indications that Pakistan has several million bonded labourers, including a large number of children. Debt slavery and bonded labour are mostly reported in agriculture, construction (in particular in rural areas), brick kilns and carpet-making sectors. The Committee had also noted that the Federal Cabinet approved a National Policy and Plan of Action for the Abolition of Bonded Labour and Rehabilitation of Freed Bonded Labourers (National Policy for the Abolition of Bonded Labour) in September 2001, but that its implementation has been slow. The Committee had noted that, by virtue of section 4(1) of the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act (BLSA), 1992, “the bonded labour system shall stand abolished and every bonded labourer shall stand free and discharged from any obligation to render any bonded labour”. Section 4(2) of the BLSA states that no one shall make an advance under or in pursuance of the bonded labour system or other forms of forced labour.

The Committee notes that, in its report submitted under Convention No. 29, the Government specifies recent initiatives against bonded labour it is taking or contemplating, apparently within the framework of its National Policy for the Abolition of Bonded Labour, including the establishment of a legal aid service and the incorporation of the issue of child bonded labour into the syllabi of the judicial, police and civil service academies. The Committee also notes that an ILO project to promote the elimination of bonded labour in Pakistan (PEBLIP) is being implemented for the period of March 2007 to April 2010 as an expansion and continuation of ongoing technical cooperation undertaken by the ILO in Pakistan since 2001. One of the key strategies of this project is to focus on policy and law revision to create a national conducive environment and to develop institutional capacity for its effective implementation, while the key implementation mechanism will be the National Committee on Bonded Labour, a tripartite-plus standing committee established under the National Policy on Abolition of Bonded Labour. The project aims to protect bonded labourers, prevent women and men who are at risk of falling into bondage and assist the families that have been released from bondage.

The Committee once again reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(a) of the Convention, child debt bondage is prohibited, and that under Article 1 of the Convention, it is obliged to take immediate measures to prohibit and eliminate this worst form of child labour. While recognizing the initiatives taken by the Government pursuant to the National Policy on Abolition of Bonded Labour, the Committee requests the Government to continue to take measures to ensure its effective implementation. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the impact of the ILO PEBLIP project on the situation of child bonded labourers in Pakistan, notably with regard to the removal of children under 18 from bonded labour and their rehabilitation.

Article 3(d), and Article 4, paragraph 1. Hazardous work. The Committee had previously noted that article 11(3) of the Constitution states that “no child below the age of fourteen years shall be engaged in any factory or mine or any other hazardous employment”. The Committee had also noted that sections 2 and 3 of the Employment of Children Act of 1991 provide that children under 14 years of age shall not be employed in the occupations listed in Parts I and II of the Schedule of the Employment of Children Act which provide for a detailed list of the types of work that children under 14 years of age shall not perform. Section 12 of the Employment of Children Rules of 1995 also provides for types of work that shall not be performed by children under 14. The Committee had also observed that night work between 7 p.m. and 8 a.m. is prohibited for children under 14 years of age under section 7 of the Employment of Children Act of 1991. The Committee had further noted the Government’s indication that the Ministry of Labour, Manpower and Overseas Pakistanis was working on the consolidation and rationalization of labour laws which will include amending the definition of a child so as to bring its legislation into line with the Convention. The Government had added that the process requires the approval of Parliament, which takes time.

The Committee notes that, according to the information provided by the Government, the Employment of Children Act, as amended by Act No. 1280(1) of 2005, includes in the list of types of hazardous work prohibited to children under 14 years of age “work in underground mines and quarries including blasting and assisting in blasting”. The Committee once again recalls that, under Article 3(d) of the Convention, children under 18 shall not perform work which, by its nature of the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm their health, safety or morals. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to take immediate measures as a matter of urgency to ensure that the legislation is amended to raise the minimum age for admission to hazardous work to 18. It also once again asks the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the types of hazardous work, in particular those provided in Parts I and II of the Schedule of the Employment of Children Act, are prohibited to children under 18 years of age.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. 1. Local vigilance committees. The Committee had noted, in its previous comments, the ITUC’s indication that the BLSA prohibits bonded labour but remains ineffective in practice. It had also noted that local vigilance committees were constituted to monitor the implementation of the BLSA but that there were reports of serious corruption within these committees. The Committee had noted that the vigilance committees are composed of the deputy commissioner of the district, representatives of the police, the judiciary, the legal profession, the municipal authorities; and under the recommendation of the ILO Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, membership was extended to include workers’ and employers’ representatives. The Committee had also noted the Government’s statement that efforts were being made to implement the BLSA with an Anti-Corruption Strategy that was formulated in 2003. The Committee notes that, in the framework of the 2007 ILO PEBLIP project, the vigilance committees will also ensure better on-ground implementation of project activities. Furthermore, according to the Government’s report submitted under Convention No. 29, one of the recent initiatives taken by the Government within the framework of the National Policy for the Abolition of Bonded Labour is to organize training workshops for key district government officials and other stakeholders to enhance their capacity and enable them to draw up district-level plans to identify bonded labourers and activate the district vigilance committees. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken by the local vigilance committees to ensure the effective implementation of the BLSA and of the ILO PEBLIP project to promote the elimination of bonded labour, and the results achieved. It also requests the Government to indicate whether the Anti-Corruption Strategy has contributed to improving the implementation of the BLSA.

2. Labour inspection. The Committee had noted, in its previous comments concerning the application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the measures taken by the Government in cooperation with ILO–IPEC to reinforce labour inspection so as to efficiently combat child labour. The Committee had noted, however, the ITUC’s indications that the number of inspectors is insufficient, that they lack training and are reported to be open to corruption. The ITUC had added that inspections do not take place in undertakings employing less than ten employees, where most child labour occurs. The Committee notes the indication of the PWF, according to which the Government of Pakistan should take more effective measures to monitor the use of child labour in the informal sector with the cooperation of the “Independent Labour Inspection Machinery”. Furthermore, in communications sent to the Office with the Government’s report under Convention No. 81, the PWF indicates that the governments of the two largest provinces of the country, namely Sindh and Punjab, have no system for supervising the application of the legislation. According to the PWF, these governments apply a policy of not inspecting a business for one year following its establishment. The PWF, in a communication of May 2007, further indicates that in the two abovementioned provinces, inspectors may not enter a workplace without prior permission from the employer or prior notice on the employer. The Committee also notes that, in its communication of 21 September 2008, the PWF observes that the Employment of Children Act of 1991 needs to be implemented more effectively. In this regard, the PWF indicates that it held a bilateral dialogue with the Federal Minister and the provincial governments to enforce the provisions of this Act through an effective labour inspection mechanism.

The Committee notes that, according to the Technical Progress Report of March 2007 for the ILO–IPEC project to combat child labour in the carpet industry, the ILO’s external monitoring system is in place in each district of Pakistan and independent verification of the child labour situation is being done continuously through the ILO’s external monitoring system. In the case of the carpet weaving industry, the Committee notes that 4,865 monitoring visits have been made to 3,147 workplaces in the project areas, while 2,569 visits have been made to non-formal education centres to verify that children who were prevented or withdrawn from carpet weaving were actually attending schools. The Committee also notes that, according to the information available to the Office under Convention No. 81, a tripartite workshop organized jointly with the ILO–IPEC on “Revitalizing Labour Inspections System in Punjab” was held on 22 and 23 August 2007 in Lahore. In the course of the workshop, various issues were addressed including the Government’s labour inspection policy. The Committee nevertheless notes the information provided by the Government that 49,547 inspections were carried out in 2005, 9,286 in 2006 and 322 in 2007. It observes with concern that, according to those statistics, the number of inspections has decreased dramatically from 2005 to 2007. The Committee requests the Government to continue taking measures to train labour inspectors and provide them with adequate human and financial resources in order to enable them to monitor the effective implementation of the national provisions giving effect to the Convention, in all sectors where the worst forms of child labour exist and, more specifically, to strengthen the monitoring systems in the Punjab and Sindh provinces. It also requests the Government to provide more information on the number of workplaces investigated per year, and on the findings of labour inspectors with regard to the extent and nature of violations detected concerning children involved in the worst forms of child labour.

Article 6. Programmes of action. TICSА-II project. The Committee had previously noted that the subregional project to combat child trafficking (TICSА) aimed at, amongst other things, determining the demand side of trafficking of children and women in Pakistan for labour and sexual exploitation. The Committee notes that, according to the Technical Project Report of March 2006 for the second phase of the TICSА project (TICSА-II), the regional study on the demand side of trafficking in Asia has been completed. The Committee also notes that an Information Kit on Human Trafficking was developed in English and Urdu to provide training to district officials, representatives of workers' and employers' organizations, non-governmental organizations and other relevant groups in the districts of Sindh and Punjab. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken as a result of the regional study on the demand side of trafficking in Asia and information on the use and efficacy of the Information Kit on Human Trafficking.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Penalties. The Committee had previously noted the ITUC's indication that persons found guilty of violating child labour legislation are rarely prosecuted and that when they are prosecuted, the fines imposed are usually insignificant. The Committee notes the APFTU's indication, in its recent communication, that, although child labour is prohibited by national legislation, the reality of the situation shows that child labour and its worst forms are still widespread.

The Committee notes that, according to the information provided by the Government, the number of prosecutions decreased from 377 in 2005, to 55 in 2006, to none in 2007. The Committee observes that the statistics provided by the Government offer no particular indication as to whether the prosecutions that were reported relate to cases which involved the engagement of children under 18 years of age in the worst forms of child labour. The Committee once again recalls that, by virtue of Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention, the Government shall take the necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including through the application of dissuasive sanctions. The Committee once again emphasizes the importance of taking the necessary measures to ensure that whoever violates the legal provisions giving effect to the Convention is prosecuted and to press for the imposition of sufficiently effective and dissuasive penal sanctions. It also once again requests the Government to provide information on the practical application of the laws, including the number of infringements reported of the abovementioned provisions, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Bonded labour. The Committee had previously noted that, according to the Rapid Assessment Studies on Bonded Labour in Different Sectors in Pakistan of 2004, workers in the brick kiln sector were not aware of the general legislation that applies to bondage. It notes that, in the framework of the 2007 ILO PEBLIP project, one of the followed strategies is to field-test tripartite models for the prevention of bonded labour, in particular through pilot initiatives in the brick kiln sector in Punjab. The project also aims to launch a national-level programme on awareness raising. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the impact of the ILO PEBLIP project on preventing children under 18 years of age from being engaged in bonded labour, especially in the brick kiln sector.

Clause (b). Providing the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour, and for their rehabilitation and social integration. 1. Child victims of trafficking. The Committee notes that, according to the Technical Progress Report of March 2006 for the ILO-IPEC TICSА-II project, the Child Protection and Rehabilitation Bureau (CPRB) that has been established in Lahore to rehabilitate street children has also been assigned the task of housing returned camel jockeys from the United Arab Emirates and of facilitating their reintegration within their families and communities. The Committee also notes that the Regional Child Friendly Guidelines for the Rehabilitation of the Victims of Trafficking have been developed in the framework of the TICSА-II project. The objective of this activity is to contribute to the improvement of the overall services at the rehabilitation shelters during the process of recovery and rehabilitation of the child victims of trafficking. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of child victims of trafficking for labour or sexual exploitation who were effectively withdrawn and rehabilitated by the CPRB or other rehabilitation shelters.

2. Child bonded labourers. The Committee had previously noted that the European Union and the ILO were assisting the Government in the setting up of 18 community education and action centres for combating exploitative child labour through prevention, withdrawal and rehabilitation of former child bonded labourers. The Committee had also noted that the Government had established a "Fund for the education of working children and rehabilitation of freed bonded labourers". The Committee notes that the 2007 ILO PEBLIP project to promote the elimination of bonded labour in Pakistan aims to provide social and economic assistance to the families that have been released from bondage to help them re-establish their lives. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the abovementioned measures on removing children from bonded labour and on providing for their rehabilitation and social integration.

3. Children working in the carpet industry. The Committee had previously noted the ITUC's indication that 1.2 million children were reported to work in the carpet industry, which is a hazardous industry. It had noted that the Pakistan

Carpet Manufacturers' and Exporters' Association (PCMEA) and ILO–IPEC launched in 1998 a project to combat child labour in the carpet industry which had, so far, contributed to the withdrawal of 13,000 carpet-weaving children (83 per cent of whom were girls) from hazardous working conditions. The Committee notes that, according to the March 2007 Technical Progress Report for the second phase of the ILO–IPEC project to combat child labour in the carpet industry, a baseline survey on child labour in the carpet weaving industry in the province of Sindh has been completed. According to this survey, there are over 25,752 carpet weaving households in the Sindh province with an estimated 33,735 carpet weaving children, out of which 24,023 are estimated to be below 14 years of age and 9,712 are between 14 and 18 years of age. The Committee notes with interest that 11,933 children (8,776 girls and 3,157 boys) have been withdrawn from carpet weaving and enrolled in non-formal education centres. The Committee once again encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to rehabilitate children under 18 years of age who undertake hazardous work in the carpet weaving industry and to provide information on the results achieved.

4. Children working in the surgical instruments industry. The Committee had previously noted the ITUC's indication that children constitute about 15 per cent of the workforce in the surgical instruments industry, which is one of the most hazardous industries. The Committee had also noted that the ILO–IPEC, with the assistance of the Italian social partners and the Surgical Instruments Manufacturers' Association of Pakistan, launched in 2000, a project to combat hazardous and exploitative child labour in surgical instruments manufacturing through prevention, withdrawal and rehabilitation. Under its direct action programmes, 1,496 children employed in surgical instruments production workshops had received non-formal education and pre-vocational training. The Committee had noted that this project had been extended up to 2006 to cover a larger number of children. It notes that, according to the progress report for the second phase of the ILO–IPEC project of January 2005 to May 2006, 2,033 children working in the surgical instruments industry received non-formal education through their placement in non-formal education centres or non-formal education cells with mobile teaching systems. The Committee notes with interest that, of these children, 633 were mainstreamed from the non-formal education centres to neighbouring schools, thereby withdrawn completely from work, while 137 children have left the surgical trade due to other project interventions. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to withdraw and rehabilitate children under 18 years of age performing hazardous types of work in the surgical instruments industry and to provide information on the results achieved.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. 1. Child bonded labourers in mines. The Committee had previously noted that, according to the Rapid Assessment Studies on Bonded Labour in Different Sectors in Pakistan (Chapter 4 on the mining sector, pages 1, 24 and 25), some miners ask their children of 10 years of age to work with them in mines to lighten the burden of peshgi (i.e. any advance whether in cash or in kind made to the labourer). Thus, in Punjab and in the North-West Frontier Province (NWFP), children are usually assigned the job of taking donkeys underground and bringing them out laden with coal. The rapid assessment also indicates that children working in mines are sexually abused by miners. The Committee once again asks the Government to take the necessary effective and time-bound measures to eliminate child debt bondage in mines, as a matter of urgency.

2. Children working in brick kilns. The Committee had previously noted that nearly half of children aged 10–14 working in brick kilns work more than ten hours a day without any safeguards and that working in the kilns is a particularly hazardous occupation for children. The Committee notes that, according to the Technical Progress Report of March 2007 for the ILO–IPEC project to combat child labour in the carpet industry, 3,315 children have been withdrawn from trades, including agriculture, scavenging and the brick kilns industry. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to protect children under 18 engaged in the brick kilns sector from hazardous work and to provide information on progress made in this regard.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. Regional cooperation. The Committee had previously noted that Pakistan participates in the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC). The Committee had noted that the Government signed the SAARC Convention on Preventing and Combating Trafficking in Women and Children for Prostitution in 2002. It had noted that according to the ILO–IPEC TICSAs report of September 2002, the signatories had committed themselves to develop a regional plan of action and to establish a regional task force against trafficking. The Committee had also noted that, according to the ILO–IPEC Technical Progress Report of September 2004, Pakistan signed Memoranda of Understanding with Thailand and Afghanistan to promote bilateral cooperation and address various issues of mutual interest including human trafficking. The Committee notes that, according to the March 2006 Technical Progress Report for the ILO–IPEC TICSAs-II project, national governments in the Asia–Pacific region increasingly recognize the interrelationship between unregulated labour migration and child trafficking and this new realization is leading towards an approach in dealing with the human trafficking issues within the migration framework. According to the report, newly signed bilateral agreements could contribute positively to efforts to combat child trafficking. The Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in the launching of a regional plan of action and regional task force against trafficking. It also once again asks the Government to provide information on the impact of the Memoranda of Understanding signed with Afghanistan and Thailand, as well as of any other bilateral agreement, on the elimination of child trafficking.

Part V of the report form. Practical application of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee pointed out that accurate data on the extent of bonded labour is essential to develop effective programmes to eliminate debt bondage. The Committee once again encourages the Government to undertake a nationwide survey in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations and with human rights institutions and organizations to determine the extent of child debt bondage and its characteristics.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77) (ratification: 1962)

Article 6 of the Convention. Vocational guidance and physical and vocational rehabilitation of children and young persons found to be unsuited to work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the information provided by the Government that there is a policy in the country to develop programmes which guarantee adequate standards of living for children and young persons, ensure that they receive the necessary protection when they are at risk and provide for their physical and mental rehabilitation. It noted that none of these programmes makes specific provision for measures to be taken for the vocational guidance and physical and vocational rehabilitation of children and young persons found by medical examination to be unsuited to certain types of work or to have physical handicaps or limitations.

In its report, the Government indicates that section 1 of General Act No. 27050 respecting persons with disabilities provides that the objective of the law is to establish a legal regime of protection and care in relation to health, work, education, rehabilitation, social security and prevention so that persons with disabilities can develop and achieve social, economic and cultural integration. It adds that, under section 33 of Act No. 27050, as amended by Act No. 28164, the Ministry of Labour and Employment Promotion, in collaboration with the National Council for the Integration of Persons with Disabilities, supports measures for the development of work and special programmes for persons with disabilities. Under the terms of this provision, the executive, its decentralized bodies, state enterprises, regional governments and municipal authorities are under the obligation to employ a quota of 3 per cent of persons with disabilities. Furthermore, the Government refers to the establishment of a register of enterprises that are favourable to persons with disabilities and the establishment of a free medical certificate of incapacity. It also refers to the adoption of the Plan on Equality of Opportunities for Persons with Disabilities.

While taking due note of the detailed information provided by the Government, the Committee notes that it does not give effect to the Convention. Indeed, these measures are intended to implement a policy of the development and integration of persons with disabilities, especially through employment, but do not concern children and young persons found by medical examination to be unsuited to certain types of work or to have physical handicaps or limitations. In this respect, the Committee reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 6, paragraph 1, of the Convention, the competent authority must take appropriate measures for the vocational guidance and physical and vocational rehabilitation of children and young persons found by medical examination to be unsuited to certain types of work. Under the terms of Article 6, paragraph 2, cooperation shall be established between the labour, health, educational and social services, and effective liaison shall be maintained between these services. In this respect, the Committee refers to Paragraphs 9 and 10 of Recommendation No. 79, which contains additional indications on the measures to be taken by the national authority for the implementation of this Article of the Convention. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures for the vocational guidance and physical and vocational rehabilitation of children and young persons found by medical examination to be unsuited to certain types of work. It also requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to establish cooperation between the labour, health, educational and social services concerned, and effective liaison between these services.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice. It notes that the Government's report does not contain any information in this respect. The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of March 2006 (CRC/C/PER/CO/3, paragraph 62), the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed deep concern at the information that hundreds of thousands of children and adolescents are in the labour market, marginalized from education and victims of exploitation and abuse. The Committee on the Rights of the Child further noted with concern that legislative provisions protecting children from economic exploitation are often violated and that children are exposed to dangerous or degrading work. In view of the above, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, including statistical data on the number of children and young persons engaged in work and who have undergone the medical examinations provided for in the Convention, extracts of the reports of the inspection services and information on the number and nature of the infringements reported.

Noting the absence of information in the Government's report, the Committee once again requests it to confirm whether Supreme Decree No. 006-73-TR of 5 June 1973 establishing measures which give effect to most of the Articles of the Convention, is still in force.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 78) (ratification: 1962)

With regard to Article 6 of the Convention and Part V of the report form, the Committee requests the Government to refer to the comments made under Convention No. 77.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Supervision of the enforcement of the system of medical examination for fitness for employment of children engaged either on their own account or on account of their parents. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Code of Children and Young Persons does not contain provisions respecting the identification measures necessary to supervise the implementation of the system of medical examinations for fitness for employment of young persons who, either on their own account or on account of their parents, are engaged in itinerant trading or any other occupation carried on in the streets or in places to which the public have access. It requested the Government to indicate the provisions of the national legislation envisaging the identification measures necessary to supervise the application of the system of medical examinations for young persons, and thereby guaranteeing the application of the Convention.

The Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of March 2006 (CRC/C/PER/CO/3, paragraph 65), the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed appreciation of the programme Educadores de Calle, a programme which seeks to save children and young persons who live and work in the streets and who are exposed to exploitation, especially of an economic nature. The Committee on the Rights of the Child however expressed concern at the high number of street children, mostly due to socio-economic factors, as well as at abuse and violence in the family. The Committee once again reminds the Government that, under Article 7, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention, measures of identification have to be adopted to ensure the application of the system of medical examination for fitness for employment to children and young persons engaged either on their own account or account of their parents in itinerant trading or in any other occupation carried on in the streets or in places to which the public have access (for example, the person concerned should be in possession of a document referring to the medical examination). The Committee accordingly requests the Government to take the necessary measures in the very near future to ensure supervision of the application of the system of medical examination for fitness to children and young persons engaged either on their own account or on account of their parents in itinerant trading or in any other occupation carried on in the streets or in places to which the public have access, in accordance with Article 7, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention.

Russian Federation

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee had noted that, according to the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), thousands of persons are trafficked from the Russian Federation to other countries, including Canada, China, Germany, Israel, Italy, Japan, Spain, Thailand and the United States. Internal trafficking within the Russian Federation is also taking place; women are generally forced to work as prostitutes while men are trafficked into agricultural or construction work. There are said to be confirmed cases of children being trafficked for sexual exploitation. The Committee had further noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child in its concluding observations (CRC/C/15/Add.274 of 30 September 2005, paragraph 80) while welcoming the recent introduction of norms prohibiting the trafficking of human beings in the Criminal Code, was concerned that not enough was being done to effectively implement these provisions. The Committee on the Rights of the Child also expressed its concern that protection measures for victims of trafficking of human beings were not fully in place and that reported acts of complicity between traffickers and state officials were not being fully investigated and punished.

The Committee had observed that section 127.1 of the Criminal Code prohibits the sale and trafficking in human beings, defined as the purchase and sale of persons or their recruitment, transport, transfer, hiding or receipt, if committed for the purposes of exploitation. Subsection (2) of section 127.1 provides for a higher penalty when this offence is committed in relation to a known minor (defined in section 87 as a person aged 14 to 18 years). The Committee had also noted that subsection (2) of section 240 of the Criminal Code prohibits transporting another person across the state border of the Russian Federation for the purposes of engaging that person into prostitution or illegal detention abroad. A higher penalty is provided when this offence is committed against a minor. The Committee had noted the Government's information that, in 2002, ten cases of criminal proceedings for trafficking in minors were instituted, and 21 in 2003. In 2004, three cases of trafficking in minors were uncovered, of which two involved children aged between 1 and 3 years, and the other involved a child of 16 years.

The Committee had also noted the Government's information that during the period 2003–05, work had been under way on a draft Law on Combating Trafficking in Human Beings which is based on the Palermo Protocol and provides for appropriate measures to ensure legal protection and social rehabilitation for victims of trafficking. However, the Committee now notes that, according to information available at the Office, specific trafficking victim assistance legislation, pending before the Duma, was neither passed nor enacted in 2006.
